

THE BOOK WAS DRENCHED

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OU_164609

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OUP—552—7-7-66—10,000

OSMANIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Call No. 354.4205 Accession No. 14966
K 28B

Author Keck, Arthur B.
Title British cabinet system
1830-1938. 1339

This book should be returned on or before the date last marked below.

THE BRITISH CABINET SYSTEM, 1830 - 1938

BY THE SAME EDITOR:

RIDGES' CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF ENGLAND.
Sixth Edition (1937). £1 1s. net.

DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS.
Fifth Edition (1932). £2 15s. net.

WHEATON'S INTERNATIONAL LAW.
Sixth Edition (1929). £3 3s. net.

THE BRITISH CABINET SYSTEM, 1830-1938

BY

ARTHUR BERRIEDALE KEITH
D.C.L., LL.D., D.Litt., F.B.A.,

OF THE INNER TEMPLE, BARRISTER-AT-LAW, AND ADVOCATE OF THE SCOTTISH BAR; REGIUS PROFESSOR OF SANSKRIT AND COMPARATIVE PHILOLOGY AND LECTURER ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE AT THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH; FORMERLY ASSISTANT SECRETARY TO THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

LONDON :

STEVENS AND SONS, LIMITED
119 & 120, CHANCERY LANE, Law Publishers.

—
1939.

- PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN BY
C. F. ROWORTH LTD., 88 FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.4.

In Memoriam

MARGARET STOBIE KEITH

AND MARGARET BALFOUR KEITH.

PREFACE.

THE Reform Acts of 1832 created an electorate capable of calling members of the House of Commons to account for the votes which they gave on issues of public affairs, and members were thus given effective inducement to control the Cabinet, which hitherto had depended essentially on the favour of the sovereign.

On the basis of the changed position of the electorate there was developed a complex system of ministerial responsibility to the Commons, and the reduction of the former power of the Crown to a measure of persuasive authority.

The extension of the franchise in 1867 started a further development, under which the Cabinet became more directly the choice of the electorate, and this process has been strengthened by the successive additions to the electorate in 1884, 1918 and 1928. At the same time the position of the Prime Minister has tended to grow in importance, as compared with that of other members of the Cabinet, and relatively no doubt the authority of the Crown has diminished, despite the accession of prestige due to the growth of Dominion autonomy, which renders the sovereign and the allegiance due to him the sole link of importance in the constitutional sphere between the Dominions and the United Kingdom.

It is the object of this work to describe in detail the operation of the Cabinet system, and the relations of the Cabinet to Parliament, the electorate, the party system, and the Crown. The subject is treated with constant reference to the history of its development, without which much of its present working would be unintelligible, but the chief effort is to show how the system works at the present day, to call attention to the difficulties now arising, and to note the conditions of its continued successful functioning. It has operated so successfully in the past that it is legitimate to hope that it may adapt itself to new situations with equal good fortune.

For much help I am indebted to Mrs. N. B. DEWAR.

A. B. K.

THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH,

November, 1938.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER.	PAGE
I. THE DEVELOPMENT OF CABINET GOVERNMENT . . .	1
1. The Conventional Basis of Cabinet Government	1
2. The Evolution of the Constitutional Conven-tions	14
3. The Separation of Cabinet and Council	24
II. THE FORMATION AND DISSOLUTION OF THE CABINET	30
1. The Selection of the Prime Minister	30
2. The Prime Minister's Formation of the Cabinet	48
3. The Formal Transfer of Office	62
4. The Cabinets from William IV.	65
III. THE PRIME MINISTER AND HIS COLLEAGUES	75
1. The Status of the Prime Minister	75
2. The Functions of the Prime Minister	86
3. The Removal of Ministers	101
IV. THE WORKING OF THE CABINET SYSTEM	109
1. The Functions of the Cabinet	109
• 2. The Doctrine of Collective Responsibility	120
3. Coalition Governments	128
4. The Procedure of the Cabinet	130
5. The Committee of Imperial Defence	139
6. Other Cabinet Committees	147
• 7. The Secrecy of Cabinet Proceedings	151
8. The War Cabinet and the Project of Cabinet Reform	156
V. THE MINISTRY	167
1. The Extent and Character of Responsibility for Administration	167
2. The Functions of Ministers	172
3. The Treasury and the Departments : Co-operation and Control	188

CHAPTER.		PAGE
VI. THE PRIVY COUNCIL AND THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE
1. The Privy Council	...	203
2. The Lord Chancellor	...	206
3. The Lord Privy Seal	...	209
4. The Secretariat	...	210
5. The Secretary of State for Home Affairs	...	211
6. The Secretary of State for Scotland	...	215
7. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs	...	217
8. The Secretaries of State for Dominion Affairs and the Colonies	...	220
9. The Secretaries of State for India and Burma	...	223
10. The Secretaries of State for War and Air	...	224
11. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence	...	227
12. The Treasury and Subordinate Departments	...	229
13. The Postmaster-General	...	232
14. The Board of Trade	...	234
15. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries	...	236
16. The Ministry of Transport	...	237
17. The Ministry of Labour	...	239
18. The Ministry of Health	...	239
19. The Ministry of Pensions	...	241
20. The Board of Education	...	241
21. The Minor Ministries	...	243
22. The Parliamentary Under-Secretaries	...	246
23. The Non-Political Departments	...	248
VII. THE CABINET AND PARLIAMENT		251
1. Cabinet Control and the House of Commons	...	251
2. The Mechanism of Control: the Party System and the Whips	...	256
3. The Extent and Character of Cabinet Control	...	278
4. The Cabinet and the Electorate: Dissolution and Mandate	...	287
(a) Dissolution or Resignation	...	287
(b) The Mandate	...	304
5. The Formulation of Issues	...	313
6. The Cabinet and the Leaders in Opposition	...	320

CHAPTER.		PAGE
VII. THE CABINET AND PARLIAMENT—continued.
7. The Cabinet and the House of Lords	327
8. The Limitation of Cabinet Authority	332
(a) Proportional Representation	335
(b) The Referendum	341
(c) Parliamentary Committees	346
(d) Devolution, Regional or Functional	349
VIII. THE CABINET AND THE CROWN	356
1. The Evolution of the Position of the Crown	356
(a) The Growth of Cabinet Responsibility	...	356
(b) Cabinet Responsibility and the Abdication of Edward VIII.	366
2. Ministerial Responsibility and the Dismissal of Ministers	368
3. The Crown and the Dissolution of Parliament		391
4. The Cabinet, the Crown, and the House of Lords	399
5. The Participation of the King in the Formation of Policy and in Government	410
(a) The King's Relations to the Cabinet	410
(b) The King and the Work of the Departments	424
(c) The King and the Opposition	431
(d) The King's Sources of Knowledge	441
(e) The Forms of, and Responsibility for, the King's Administrative Acts	450
IX. THE KING'S INFLUENCE ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS ..		455
1. The Sources and Character of Royal Influence		455
2. The Sovereign and Internal Affairs	461
3. The Sovereign and Foreign Policy	468
4. The Sovereign and the Empire	495
5. The Sovereign and Defence	512
6. The Sovereign and Ecclesiastical Policy	522
7. Crown Appointments	532
8. The Honours Prerogative	540
X. THE CONSTITUTION UNDER STRAIN	553
1. The International Crisis of September, 1938	553
2. The Effect of the Crisis on the Constitution	559

THE BRITISH CABINET SYSTEM

1830—1938.

CHAPTER I.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF CABINET GOVERNMENT.

1. The Conventional Basis of Cabinet Government.

THE national government of Great Britain to-day is controlled by the Cabinet, who, indeed, are His Majesty's servants, but for all normal purposes servants whose advice the King must accept, and readily does accept. The Cabinet itself owes its unity to its selection by the Prime Minister, who is chosen by the sovereign. But the choice of the sovereign is conditioned by the consideration that it is imperative that his nominee should be able to command the votes of a majority of the members of the House of Commons. These members in turn are elected at intervals of not more than five years by an electorate, which in principle includes all persons, male and female, not under twenty-one years of age. The effective working of the system depends on the existence of political parties, through whose activities in organisation the electors in the constituencies, which almost all choose one member only, are presented with the opportunity of voting for one or other of candidates who profess allegiance to a distinct party and to the principles it professes. In practice the elector votes often, not so much for principles, as for the recognised leader or sometimes leaders of one party or another. He may feel himself incompetent to decide on measures to be taken in the future. He often thinks he knows in whom he may put his trust, and is prepared to accept what plans ultimately approve themselves in his leader's eyes.

Essentially the whole system of the supreme control of administration and legislation rests on the observation of certain practices, which are conveniently styled constitutional conventions. That this is so is admitted on every hand. Recognition of it was accorded by Article 2 of the Agreement for a Treaty between Great Britain and Ireland of 1921, when the law, practice and constitutional usage governing the relationship of the Crown or of its representative, or of the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion of Canada were made applicable to the Irish Free State, and in sect. 4 of the Status of the Union Act, 1934, of the Union Parliament, specific reference is made to the constitutional conventions regulating the use by the Governor-General of his legal power of summoning and dissolving Parliament and of appointing ministers. It is essentially by the growth of conventions that the Cabinet system exists. Save for the most occasional allusion, as in the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, neither Prime Minister nor Cabinet is known to law, and one may still search in vain in the statute book for any recognition of the party system, and yet the essential control of British administration and legislation is vested in a Cabinet, whose existence would be impossible in its present form without the co-operation of party organisation.

Convention (a) alone provides for the essential rules of Cabinet government. It demands that the will of the electorate at a general election, which under law must be held quinquennially at least, shall be reflected by the sovereign continuing in office or placing therein as Prime Minister, with power to choose his colleagues, the leader of the victorious party. It requires that the Cabinet shall maintain continuous touch with the Commons by meeting Parliament every year. It demands that, if the Commons withdraws its support, the

(a) Ridges, Const. Law of England (ed. Keith), pp. 3 ff.; Dicey, Introduction, pp. 413—455.

Cabinet must either resign, or appeal to the electorate for a new mandate. If that is not accorded, the ministry must resign if the election has given a clear majority to the opposing party, but, if there are more opposing parties than one, and the result is not clear, it may meet Parliament and allow a vote to decide its fate. But it cannot ask another dissolution, nor should the Crown concede it if it were asked. Convention again determines that the Cabinet is collectively responsible for the conduct of the executive government and for appointments made, and that its duty is to initiate legislation. It requires a ministry in case of domestic crisis to exert all its powers to maintain law and order, but also to summon Parliament forthwith to consult with it. It equally demands that in conducting foreign affairs, which appertains in law solely to the Crown, the ministry shall have full regard to the will of the Commons, and shall not declare war, or neutrality, or make peace, or enter into important treaties without securing as soon as possible endorsement by the Commons, which so far as is possible should be taken into counsel before the Crown is committed to any definite course of action.

The Crown again, by convention, is required to accept the advice of the Cabinet in all cases, unless it is prepared to find another ministry, which will justify to Parliament, and secure its approval of, the refusal to accept the advice of the previous ministry. It must, therefore, in all normal circumstances, assent to any bill which is passed by the two houses of Parliament, or by the Commons, under the Parliament Act, 1911, and it must grant a dissolution to a ministry, unless it has already been granted recently a dissolution without securing as a consequence a renewal of the confidence of the electorate.

It rests also on convention that the Cabinet depends for its existence on the lower house only, and may disregard the hostility of the upper chamber. The essential principle of the initiative in finance of the lower House, under the authority of the Cabinet, and of the subordination of the Lords rested solely on convention until the Parliament Act, 1911. The same Act rendered definite and greatly limited the power of the Lords to deal with legislation, which, in theory absolute, had hitherto been regulated, as it proved inadequately, by convention only.

One of the fundamental principles which renders the operation of Cabinet government in Britain essentially different from its operation in France is purely conventional, the rule that the Commons will deal with financial proposals only on the initiative of the ministry, with which therefore rests the framing of the budget, the determination of expenditure and the devising of taxation (b). How essential this is for the British system of Cabinet government as opposed, for instance, to the French, can be seen from the fact that the adoption of the same rule necessarily accompanied the creation of Cabinet government in the British colonies.

It is again by convention only that the Commons does not attempt, by the creation of committees, to control in detail administration and legislative proposals, as is done in France.

Conventions, as may be seen, are merely usages, and they are styled conventions, without any implication that they have the force of law. From law proper they differ in part in definiteness. When it was proposed on the grant of responsible government to the Australian colonies to lay down by law the cases in which the Crown might or might not disallow legislation, the decision in favour of abandoning the attempt, which had the support of Mr. Gladstone (c), was largely based on the advantages of the flexibility of constitutional usage over law, which could only be altered by a fresh appeal to Parliament. When, on the other hand, the Parliament Act, 1911, was passed, it was because the Lords held wider ideas on the nature of the convention regarding acceptance by that chamber of legislation passed by the Commons, and the latter demanded more precise definition. No doubt this is not an invariable criterion. The rules of the Commons, as to initiation of legislation, are precise and explicitly formulated; and in the case of the relations of the Crown and ministers certain doctrines are equally clear, but in general the doctrine holds good.

(b) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), pp. 97 ff.

(c) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions (1928), i. 24.

Law, again, has one advantage over conventions in its categorical character. If it is formally enacted, a principle is felt to express the will of the country, and to command obedience from a people which still respects law as prima facie the embodiment of the public will, as opposed to a convention which may be regarded as the expression of practical convenience, but without cogency, if other considerations arise. Moreover, in many cases law can be enforced in the sense that the Courts can be invited to pass judgment on actions declared to be contrary to law, and these judgments will normally be enforced by the administrative machinery appointed for that end. No Government can lightly face the feeling which is created by any declaration that it has acted illegally, for that would arouse against it, not merely the opposition, but the public opinion of a vast body of electors, who feel that it is imperative to uphold the validity of the law. Even a strong ministry cannot risk difficulties arising from this source. When it turned out that the ministry had made a mistake in arresting, and handing over to the Irish Free State, Mr. Art O'Brien (d), the fact that its action might be morally justifiable, did not prevent the country being insistent when it was ruled to be technically illegal, on the grant of compensation to him and others in like position by the Restoration of Order in Ireland (Indemnity) Act, 1923. This psychological fact must be borne in mind, and it operates even where it would be impossible to enforce through the existing machinery a declaration by the Courts of law, or even to obtain a formal declaration of law, as when a Government expends money without due legislative sanction (e). In such a case it may be impossible for a private person to secure a declaration that the act is illegal, but opinion will resent it. In the case of a convention it is always possible to argue that it is not established, that what has happened in the past is not a binding precedent, and that in new circumstances a new line should be struck out. This position is aided by the fact that, while writers of text-books on constitutional matters seldom disagree as to the law, they do disagree in the most marked manner as to the extent to which conventions exist and are binding, and their views necessarily change with each practical issue arising.

(d) Home Secretary v. O'Brien, [1923] A. C. 603.

(e) Dalrymple v. Colonial Treasurer, [1910] T. P. 372; Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions (1928), i. 186 ff.

Conventions, therefore, are really only usages in matters affecting the constitution, and an effort to distinguish between usages and conventions, on the ground that the latter are usages followed, because they are held to be binding, is really of minimal value. A usage in constitutional matters, it will be found on investigation, is normally based on some definite convenience or utility in relation to the constitutional system of the day, and with the passing of the years it is followed under the influence of the normal psychological principle of imitation and willingness to follow precedent. In England this attitude of mind has created for our Courts the rule of obeying precedents, a principle which is not by any means normally accepted by judiciaries, and which has opponents in distinguished legal circles. There can be no doubt that the judicial outlook has helped to encourage in constitutional matters the search for precedent, since it is a familiar and marked example of the putting into operation of a natural human tendency. When Queen Victoria died, the immediate reaction of the Office of Works was to look for the precedent of 1837 (f), and for each British coronation regard has been sedulously had to the precedents of the former. Lord Esher's work for the sovereign took largely the form of collecting the stores of precedent to be found among the royal archives, and of adducing thence such authority as he thought fit to guide the monarch in new emergent cases. Any usage, it may fairly be said, in England tends to gather to itself ipso facto authority, and this applied equally to any change of usage. This is the substantial justification for Lord Salisbury's declaration (g) on the issue of the franchise on October 28th, 1884: "If the House of Lords reverses its course, under threats, because a majority of the House of Commons object to their policy, it will, by that very act, become constitutional law that the House of Lords is bound to submit to the House of Commons. From that moment the Lords will have lost all power of resistance: and unchecked power will have passed to the Commons."

(f) Esher, Journals, i. 274 f.

Lord Salisbury's view is justified because, though he put the matter too strongly, he was dealing with a real probability. If the Lords yielded on such an issue as that in question, it must create a precedent of grave importance, for it would indicate that the existing constitutional system had developed to a position in which it demanded that the House of Lords should definitely subordinate its views to those of the Commons. In the same way the importance of the selection (h) of Mr. Baldwin in 1923, in lieu of Lord Curzon as Prime Minister, rests on the fact that, by passing over the man, who on existing precedents might well be deemed to have a superior claim, the King showed that he recognised that constitutional development demanded the presence of the Premier in the lower chamber to meet the Labour opposition. The new usage, it may confidently be predicted, will endure, unless and until some alteration in other constitutional conditions renders it inappropriate. In like manner we can see the fundamental misunderstanding which induced Mr. Asquith to formulate the doctrine (i) that the King would not be bound to give a dissolution to Mr. MacDonald, if that were asked for, in view of the fact that there was in operation a three-party system. What he failed to remember was that the Crown must be wholly reluctant to refuse to give the electorate a chance to give a clear verdict in favour of one political party or another, and that that consideration would drive it forthwith to concede, as it in fact did in 1924 concede, ~~a~~ dissolution to the Labour leader.

(g) Letters, 2 s., iii. 559 f.

(h) H. Nicholson, Curzon, p. 355; Ronaldshay, Curzon, iii. 352; Dugdale, Balfour, ii. 359—362.

(i) Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, p. 192 f. Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 344, ignores his error.

We must therefore set against the cogent force of any existing practice the argument that it may be departed from, because it no longer accords with the development of the constitution, when a new usage may be created, and itself be followed until circumstances alter. When a convention is claimed to be absolute, it will be found that it rests so essentially on our constitutional system that to break it would be fatal. Thus, to intermit the meeting of Parliament would result in the ministry having at no distant date no legal power to spend money, even though large sums might be in the Treasury; the Army and Air Force (Annual) Act could not be passed, and if already passed before the decision to avoid meeting Parliament would expire, and no coercion could be exercised. The Courts would vindicate the law, and the ministry would in the last resort be dismissed by the sovereign if it still clung to office. In fact, no doubt labour and general unrest would have driven it to resign if it could not face the Commons. Again, that a ministry must command the support of the Commons results from the necessity of securing finance and the Army and Air Force Act. It is true that the exercise of this control is normally not requisite, but in 1937 the Country Party in the Commonwealth of Australia, very wisely, by threatening to refuse supply, prevented the Premier from a premature dissolution of Parliament, and Mr. Aberhart in Alberta was similarly forced to concede the demands of his followers for a more intensive application of the social credit system (k) The convention that the Crown will assent to a bill passed by Parliament is, indeed, very firmly established, by reason of the fact that ever since 1705 has the sovereign thus acted. But the reason is simply that, if the sovereign felt that the ministry was carrying legislation not approved by the country, and that he could obtain a ministry which would defend his action in preventing it becoming law, he would dismiss the ministry before the measure was actually presented for his assent. That a King should not dismiss a ministry, which still commands the approval of the Commons, is no doubt strengthened by the fact that dismissal, real or virtual (l), last occurred in 1783 and 1807, before the Reform Act of 1832 gave power to the people, but it would be impossible to say that changed circumstances might not render exercise of such authority necessary.

(k) Keith, The Dominions as Sovereign States, p. 165.

Usages can easily be disregarded, on the other hand, when they rest merely on precedent and their reasons have clearly disappeared. Thus the omission from the coronation ceremonial of the banquet and the challenge of the King's champion were dropped without difficulty, as otiose and unmeaning (m). With the creation of the new legislative machinery of the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, it became convenient to dissolve the Convocations without waiting, as was normally done, for the dissolution of Parliament, and it was done without hesitation (n). In like manner, when in 1921 it was inconvenient for the King to hold a council in Scotland to approve the speech prepared for him by Cabinet, the formality, despite long usage, was readily dropped (o). In 1868 Mr. Disraeli, on defeat at the general election, decided to resign without meeting Parliament (p). No doubt, in a sense, this was revolutionary, for the old theory was that the Commons controlled the ministry, and that it should meet Parliament and receive thence its fate. But the Premier accepted the conclusion that the electorate was the true sovereign, and bowed to its will, and even Mr. Gladstone felt (l) In 1834 dismissal cannot now be admitted: Melbourne Papers, pp. 220 ff.

(m) Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. 32, 34.

(n) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 743 f., 751.

(o) Ibid. ii. 756 f.

(p) Letters, 2 s., i. 556 ff.

entitled to follow his example, despite his reverence for precedent and the authority of the Commons, while on both occasions the Queen assented to a course which had the great advantage of suiting her convenience (q). In 1929 Mr. Baldwin carried the matter rather further, for the fact that there were three parties rendered it possible to doubt if either opposition party could form an effective Government, and suggested that it would be wholly constitutional for him to meet Parliament. But he treated the vote as a clear intimation that he was not acceptable as Premier. Yet it cannot be said in this case that a binding precedent has been set. It will necessarily depend on the future development of party relationships, as will also the experiment of a Cabinet in which a vital issue was not accepted by all members as in 1932. In its actual working that effort broke down soon, but its failure, though suggestive, is naturally not definitive of the issue. Another example of a new usage is that apparently created by Mr. Baldwin, that the decision to dissolve, and of the time of dissolution of Parliament, lies with the Prime Minister (r), not the Cabinet, a view apparently shared by Mr. N. Chamberlain (s). But this innovation may not be maintained if and when there exists a Cabinet with men of independence of character who dislike the doctrine on any ground. It is certain that Labour Cabinets would not approve this exhibition of dictatorship, and would not feel bound by Conservative precedents.

Moreover, precedents have the disadvantage that they are not easy to prove. The sources whence they can be learned are unsatisfactory in the main. The biographies of statesmen, even autobiographies, are restricted by considerations of the Official Secrets Acts (t) and by obligations of propriety.

(q) Letters, 2 s., ii. 316 ff.

(r) Cf. Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, p. 41 f.

(s) When challenged to dissolve, April 4th, 1938, House of Commons.

(t) Mr. Edgar Lansbury was fined in 1934 for publishing a memo. by his father on unemployment. In the same year Cabinet memoranda were recalled from ex-Ministers.

Cabinet government is based on the duty of members to keep confidences, and publication of secrets, even long after, is not always felt to be proper. The exceptional action of ministers, as regards the transactions up to and after the Great War, as in the works of Mr. Churchill (u) and Mr. Lloyd George (x), has not passed without censure. Moreover, constitutional niceties have often no meaning for popular biographers. In many cases, again, the biographer is inclined to be a panegyrist and to view all that his subject did in a roseate light, which leads consciously or unconsciously to the suppression of facts, or even to invention. Thus, Mr. Lloyd George (y) asserts that it is a matter of history that on December 6th, 1916, all those present at the conference with the King at Buckingham Palace expressed their readiness to serve under Mr. Balfour, with the exception of Mr. Asquith, but the evidence of Mr. Asquith, as preserved by Lord Crewe (z), as well as that of Mr. Balfour (a), irresistibly suggest that Mr. George's memory has failed him. It is not then surprising if the informants of Mr. Greville often told him less than the whole truth. We can see in his own record the kind of evidence he had to rely upon; he notes, not rarely, the contradictions in the versions of people who must have had first-hand knowledge. The matter is complicated for writers at the present day, who may have knowledge given in confidence, which they cannot directly use, and who must content themselves with asserting that such and such a view is generally held, or is reasonably believed. It is significant of the difficulties of definite ascertainment that no one can give for certain the cause of the precise period for resignation chosen by Lord Salisbury, though detailed accounts were in verbal circulation on the day when his resignation was made public (b). Nor even when actions are known does it follow

(u) The World Crisis; "Winston's brilliant autobiography, disguised as a history of the universe": Earl Balfour in Dugdale, ii. 337.

(x) War Memoirs (6 vols., up to 1936).

(y) War Memoirs, ii. 997.

(z) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 274.

(a) Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, ii. 177 f.

(b) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 158 f.; E. Legge, King George, i. 49—51.

that motives are comprehended; we may cite precedents as evidence, though in following previous action a Premier may have been actuated by very different considerations than those which moved his predecessors.

Precedent, however, is always useful for argument; Lord Esher, who regularly quoted it, though he recognised that it was rarely conclusive, was an adept in selecting those which he thought most apposite, as establishing that a course of action was constitutional (c). It is always of some value to represent your own position as conforming to the principles and precedents of the constitution, and there is a prima facie case for holding that what was done before in similar circumstances by men of high standing and experience, should be done again, and that there is a case against change. Thus, the argument that the Cabinet experiment of 1931 was unconstitutional, was not without weight, and so far as experience went the opposition to the change proved not unjustified. A similar issue arose in 1938, when the Labour party demanded an election on the score that in departing from the mandate in foreign affairs, asked for in 1935, the Government was straining its constitutional powers. The ultimate criterion of constitutionality is unquestionably the verdict of the electorate. Those who contended that the Balfour ministry outstayed its mandate and should have resigned or dissolved after the defection of Mr. J. Chamberlain in 1903, might be held to have been justified by the result of the election under the new ministry. Those who contended that the formation of the National Government in 1931 was a due exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, were plainly confirmed in that belief by the endorsement of the ministry in the general election. Thus the electorate has the power to confirm old or establish new usages as constitutional, and as constituting conventions of the working of the constitution on the realm.

The constitutional system, however, can work only by moderation on the part of all concerned with it. Majority rule, if it means that the majority considers itself entitled to administer and legislate in the interests of the majority, without regard to the feelings of the minority, is a dangerous system, as can be seen from the history of Spain, where moderation and respect for minority rights has been conspicuous by its absence. The British tradition is clearly that all administration and legislation should be governed by the ideal of serving the common interest, and this in practice means that differences between the parties should be confined within limits. The future of British government is largely bound up with the question whether, if the Labour party definitely adopts and seeks to effect a complete abolition by immediate action of the social system from a capitalist to a non-capitalist basis, this can be made compatible with the former system of acceptance of certain fundamental doctrines, as binding on any party while in power. Certainly such an issue is more vital than any question as to the concession of a limited measure of autonomy in government to Ireland. It is possible also that in a socialistic Commonwealth the system of Cabinet government, based on parties, would cease to be operable.

(c) Journals, ii. 77 f., where he omits much relevant matter.

It is not unnatural that the question should have been raised, whether the time has not come to bring the present freedom of the Cabinet from legal control to a close; but public opinion still favours the policy of leaving complete liberty of development free from the difficulties inherent in written constitutions, and in attempts to place on the Courts the duty of passing legal strictures on matters of advice tendered to the sovereign regarding the use of legal powers. It is not without interest to note that two great Parliamentarians of very different types of mind were strongly opposed to judicial investigation of political action. The hopeless difficulties in which the judges on the Parnell Commission were placed were pointed out convincingly in 1890 by Mr. Gladstone (d), and Mr. Asquith (e) energetically opposed, in (d) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 390 ff., 408 ff.

(e) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 294 f., 303 ff.

1917 and 1918 alike, the proposal to set up judicial bodies to investigate the Mesopotamian fiasco and the issue of the charges made by Sir F. Maurice against Mr. Lloyd George. He disliked the idea of the mixing of the political and judicial function, and thought it damaging to the Bench that it should be involved in controversies about policy or strategy. Nor is it any answer to these objections that the judicial enquiry, conducted in 1936 (f), into the leakage of information on the budget, was plainly far superior in effectiveness and conclusiveness to any enquiry by Select Committee, such as had taken place in the matter of the Marconi scandal in 1912 (g). In these cases nothing was involved, save facts which could best be determined by the ordinary rules of common law, and no issue of political propriety was even remotely involved.

2. The Evolution of the Constitutional Conventions.

The conflicts of the Stuart kings with Parliament and the settlement after the revolution of 1688 left it impossible for the Crown to attempt to carry out a policy without regard to Parliament. The practice of legalising a standing army for a year only, though it conceded the possession of military forces, also rendered recourse to Parliament each year necessary, and the strict limitation of the sums granted to the Crown to amounts barely adequate for the conduct of the ordinary civil government rendered application to the legislature essential for any attempt to enter on a new course of policy. The fate of Danby proved that mere royal commands would not be accepted by Parliament as a defence for any acts, and the Act of Settlement forbade the grant of pardon before conviction to any person impeached. To enact legislation by prerogative, to raise taxes, to suspend Parliamentary legislation or dispense with its operation, had become illegal, and the King no longer could control the judges through the right of dismissal, so that they steadily developed not merely independence of the King but the readiness to view with strict regard to legality any acts done by the executive.[✓] Nor was it easy now to control the Commons, for to create by prerogative new members had become impossible; James II. had used legal process or the threat thereof to remodel the constitutions of Parliamentary boroughs, but the oligarchies, who thus had the power of returning members, were now safe from capricious judicial action, and the Crown dare not attack the new corporations.

(f) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5184.

(g) Spender, i. 361 ff.

To achieve harmony between sovereign and legislature thus presented new difficulties. William III. had no idea of responsible government, and his ministries of 1689—96 were constructed without predominant party considerations (h). But he gradually realised more or less clearly the advantages of having a relatively harmonious ministry, and his Whig ministry of 1697 was gradually transformed into a Tory ministry by 1700, as he appreciated that a change in the balance of power in the House of Commons in 1698 rendered advantageous a like change in the composition of his Government. Under Anne the position altered. The Queen herself was most anxious (i) to assert her right to select ministers, independently of party and Parliament alike; moreover, both under William III. and Anne the fact that a ministry of a definite party complexion was in power was a factor making for the return of members of that party to the Commons. Thus in 1695 the Whig successes at the polls were no doubt aided by the introduction of Whig ministers in lieu of Tories in the preceding year, and in 1701 the addition to Tory strength reflected the introduction prior to the election of Tory ministers. In 1702 and 1710 the choice before the elections of Tory ministers helped to procure strong Tory elements in Parliament. The reason for this result is obvious.

(h) After the election of 1690 he strengthened the Tory element in the ministry; but, perhaps on Lord Sunderland's advice, he altered its complexion to Whig, before the 1695 election, which gave a Whig majority. Cf. Jenks, Parl. England, pp. 82 ff.

(i) Hist. MSS. Comm. 9th Report, App. p. 471 f.; Emden, The People and the Constitution, p. 102.

Not only had the Crown itself a wide patronage and the power to grant pensions and honours, as well as to find the funds for direct bribery, but the magnates appointed to office had influence and power and could determine the fate of seats, especially when representation became more and more imperfect with the passage of time and the change, through economic conditions, of the distribution of the population.

Yet Anne had difficulties. Marlborough and Godolphin, finding that the Tories were lukewarm in regard to the war on which they had set their hearts, were not enthusiastic for the Hanoverian succession, and by no means inclined to the doctrine of religious toleration, had to fall back on the Whigs, and the election of 1705 gave them a real majority. The Queen was then pressed to supersede the Tory Lord Keeper by the leader of the Whigs in the Commons, and later on parted with Harley at the demand of the still indispensable Marlborough and Godolphin. When she realised from the Sacheverell incident that the change of public feeling pointed to a possibility of successful action, she removed in 1710 her Whig ministry in favour of a Tory one (k). Thus, and by no means readily, the Queen virtually admitted that party must play a considerable part in determining the composition of ministries.

But Anne, like her predecessors, still presided in Cabinet and took a definite part in the framing of policy (l). George I., however, after 1717 ceased to attend (m). He did not understand English, and Englishmen were not inclined to be sufficiently good courtiers to learn German. He could discuss foreign politics in French with the Secretaries of State, but even Lords Somers and Cowper knew no French. Robert (k) In 1711 the Whigs, headed by Walpole in the Commons, appeared as akin to an opposition party. He had vainly suggested, in 1710, combined action in resignation on the evidence of the Queen's hostility.

(l) See Turner, Cabinet Council, 1622—1784, i. 350 ff., 376 ff., 409 ff., 432 ff., 443 ff.

(m) Later cases of attendance (Turner, ii. 97—100) are almost wholly cases of final settlement of speeches to Parliament, or to consider judicial sentences. The latter usage ceased only in 1837.

Walpole and he tried to converse in bad Latin. This led inevitably to the development of the office of Prime Minister; for, once the King was removed from the Cabinet, the natural tendency was for some minister to take his place as a unifying influence. The importance of the Cabinet was also greatly enhanced, when the sovereign was unable even to understand fully the advice reported to him by the President of the Council (n). The King thus naturally for a variety of reasons concerned himself but slightly with the internal government of the country. It was not his desire to part with power; he refrained from giving Lord Halifax the post of Lord High Treasurer, as possibly creating a power dangerous to his own, but, though Lord Halifax tried to assert his authority as First Lord of the Treasury, now put in commission, he did not succeed in establishing for himself effective primacy; that he endeavoured to do so shows how natural the evolution was.

But Robert Walpole (o) succeeded where Halifax had failed, and it is significant that one source of his success lay in the fact that he was First Lord of the Treasury and in the Commons, where he was determined to remain, and which he was equally determined to control. The favour of the King was of course essential, and this he maintained when George II. was on the throne, by the conviction of Queen Caroline that his policy of maintaining peace and keeping taxation low was more favourable to the security of the dynasty than a warlike policy, such as that which her husband would have liked to follow. The royal favour gave him the means by places, money, and honours to influence, directly and indirectly, the Commons, and the fact that he kept an effective majority there dominated the position. He entered the ministry at first in a position relatively inferior to that of Townshend, but he ended by achieving complete primacy and ousting from the Cabinet any who wished to dispute his place. His rejection of the title of Prime Minister was based not on repudiation of his power, but on acceptance of the fact that to the public the style connoted a royal favourite, not the chosen of the people. His relations with the Commons led him to the decision to relinquish office in February, 1742, when it pronounced against him, after the general election of 1741. It is true that it is difficult to treat that election as fought on any definite principle (p), but we may take it that the result was influenced by his growing personal unpopularity on the score of his self-sufficiency and length of tenure of power, though the defeat did not result in any complete change in the administration and still less in the reversal of his chief policies in internal government.

(n) Michael, England under George I., i. 92 ff., 107 ff.

(o) Jenks, Parliamentary England, pp. 143 ff.; Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 50, 125—127.

Walpole never attempted to raise the question of the possibility of the Commons imposing him on the King. We find, however, that after his retirement the party managers, who adopted his methods, were strong enough to compel the King to part reluctantly with Carteret in 1744, and to accept Pitt in 1746 as a minister. This they accomplished by resigning en masse and leaving the King unable to discover any minister who would be able to win the support of the Commons. In 1756 there occurred another precedent of importance. The resignation of the Duke of Newcastle can only be attributed to his feeling that he could not face the popular clamour against his management of affairs. A like example of the weight of popular feeling, despite the existence of a majority in the Commons, may be seen in Lord Bute's resignation in 1763.

George III., however, was so completely English as himself to enter into the business of securing for himself control of the methods of persuasion which helped to keep ministries in power, of destroying parties, and of negativing collective responsibility among ministries, which plainly was a grave barrier to royal authority. His success was not slight, but it produced the evolution of a party, the Rockingham Whigs, which had definite ideas on resistance to royal control of ministries, and which held in theory the view that, if called upon to serve the King, it must do so as a unity under the control of its own chosen leader, a doctrine very much disliked by the King, and by no means generally current. When popular opinion once more drove Lord North to resign in March, 1782, an office which he had long held only to please the King, and Lord Shelburne, after the brief Rockingham ministry, was forming a Cabinet, the Duke of Grafton (q) explained that he did not regard him as Prime Minister, but only as holding the principal office in the Cabinet. When Shelburne fell in 1783, the new ministry had Fox and Lord North as the real controllers, while the Duke of Portland took the Treasury. It was only after the King's initiative in dismissing the coalition had won support from the electorate, largely no doubt owing to royal influence (r), that Pitt became effectively Prime Minister from 1784 to 1801, enjoying the full confidence of the King and primacy in his Cabinet. His refusal in 1803 to consider the suggestion of Addington that he and Pitt might be Secretaries of State, without any real Prime Minister, marks the definite ending of controversy. Since then it may be taken as generally conceded that "there should be an avowed and real minister, possessing the chief weight in the Council and the principal place in the confidence of the King" (s).

(p) Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 105, 113, 160.

But there was an obvious difficulty and defect in the system. The pleasure of the King remained the essential feature; under it the Prime Minister could secure that his Cabinet should be of one mind, as when Pitt was enabled to secure the removal of his Lord Chancellor in 1792 (t), when he opposed in the Lords a Governmental policy. But, if it failed, a successful Prime Minister might be compelled to

(q) Grafton, Memoirs, p. 361.

(r) Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 196—198. Cf. Jenks, Parl. England, pp. 277—282.

(s) Stanhope, Pitt, iv. 24.

(t) Ibid. ii. 148 ff.

resign office by a half-demented sovereign, though, as far as any ordinary judgment could go, he enjoyed the confidence of the people of his country. In like manner the same sovereign was able in 1807 to turn out the Grenville ministry and substituted that of the Duke of Portland. No one doubted under the regency or the reign of George IV. of his power to have a ministry of his liking, and the Whigs were deeply disappointed that he did not fulfil their expectations by calling them to office. In 1807 and 1812 alike, authoritative voices declared the unquestionable right of the Crown to select its own ministers, as Pitt himself had done in 1801 (u).

The explanation of a state of things so curious at first sight, lies in the condition of Parliamentary representation, which allowed the control of seats by the Government or private persons. We know, as late as 1806, that the members attached to the Government, as such, might suffice to turn the balance in the Commons, though an Act of 1809 to prevent trafficking in seats seems to have had some result. Even under Charles II. we find Lord Shaftesbury declaring that the representation was unfair, as boroughs with a handful of voters had equal representation with great boroughs. It soon became natural to look to the results in the few boroughs, such as the City of London and Westminster, with male householder suffrage, and the counties where the forty shilling freeholder prevailed. This is attested by Swift in 1711 (x), and insisted upon in The Craftsman in 1734, when it claimed that the knights of the shire were three to one for the opposition. The same view was repeated in respect of the election of 1741. Moreover, Sir R. Peel in 1829, in justifying his conversion to Catholic emancipation, cited the votes of fifteen large counties and twenty most populous towns, a fact used effectively against his opposition to reform in 1831 by Lord J. Russell and Earl Grey alike. But even in the counties (y) aristocratic influences were powerful, and sometimes by agreement Whigs and Tories divided the representation. When Brougham attacked Lord Lonsdale's interest in Westmorland he was challenging—unsuccessfully in 1818, 1820 and 1826 alike—an authority not impugned since 1774 (z). In the boroughs there were cases like Old Sarum, where the owner of some burgage land returned two members, and, taken on the whole, Charles Grey could assert that over half the Commons was sent there by 160 persons (a). Other calculations increase the figure, but the position is beyond all dispute. In 1831, when the population of England was fourteen millions, 236 members were returned for ten southern counties with 3,260,000 people, while the six of the north with 3,594,000 had but sixty-eight, so that the industrial revolution had no corresponding authority in the Commons. Birmingham and Manchester, each with more than 100,000 people, were without members, while in Cornwall there were forty-two seats for 300,000 people; of these twenty were controlled by seven peers, twenty-one by eleven commoners, and one only was free. In these conditions it is easy to understand how bribery flourished, and how after the Reform Act of 1832 many voters were sulky because the good old practice had disappeared.

(u) 35 Parl. Hist. 962.

(x) Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 188 ff.

(y) Cf. Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, i. 13, 16 ff.

Parties existed, no doubt, rather by tradition than principle, and those interested in politics attached themselves to them according as family tradition or personal ambition directed. There was no attempt, however, to organise the electors, naturally enough, since the cruder methods (b) of bribery, influence, intimidation by mob violence, and treating were easier. Reform was checked by the excesses of the French revolution, while various efforts were made to answer the arguments for it by specious retorts. Burke, who had denied the doctrine of virtual representation when adduced

(z) A. Aspinall, Lord Brougham, pp. 86 ff, 174.

(a) See J. R. M. Butler, The Passing of the Great Reform Bill; G. M. Trevelyan, Lord Grey of the Reform Bill; E. Porritt, The Unreformed House of Commons.

. (b) Cf. G. K. Clark, Peel, p. 217.

by Lord Mansfield (c) in the case against the American colonies' right to resist taxation, came in 1792 (d) to defend it for Britain, and Pitt in 1783, as well as Sir R. Peel in the case of the Reform Bill stood up for it, though plainly there was no answer to Macaulay's argument (e) that, if virtual representation really produced the same result as direct representation, there was no reason for denying the latter when it was wanted.

/ The delay in achieving reform was remarkable. But the close of the war and the repression of public opinion and meetings by the ministry, as in the Six Acts of 1819, were followed by the scandal connected with Queen Caroline which exposed to public reprobation the private life of those connected with the Court (f). At last there was some response to the propaganda which Cobbett had so long and so widely carried on against the unrepresentative character of Parliamentary institutions. In Ireland D. O'Connell formed the Catholic Association to seek to secure emancipation, and, despite efforts at repression by attacks on him and on the Association, his organisation of the voters at the elections of 1826 showed that they could, with the aid of the priests, be effectively detached from the great landowners who had seemed securely to control the votes in the counties. The success of this effort led to the decision of the Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel to concede Catholic emancipation as a means of recalling the voters to their allegiance, and thus paved the way for the advent of the Whigs to power, with the support of the Canningites, who agreed with them on the issue of reform. Among the unenfranchised workers political unions were developed in 1831—32 to agitate and hold great public meetings, at one of which at Birmingham, in November, 1831, the threat to refuse to pay taxes was uttered. The

(c) Keith, Const. Hist. of First British Empire, pp. 355 ff.

(d) A Letter to Sir Hercules Langrishe.

(e) 23 Parl. Hist. 831; 24 Parl. Deb. 2 s., 1243; 2 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 1197, Emden, The People and the Constitution, p. 191 f.

(f) J. R. M. Butler, The Passing of the Great Reform Bill, p. 38.

Reform Act of 1832 (g) only in part satisfied the agitators, for it gave a much less generous extension of the franchise than had been hoped for, and open voting left much room for influence and bribery; but it was of fundamental importance as creating the necessary conditions for the operation of true Cabinet government in the shape of the existence of an authority which, when consulted, could give a verdict which the Commons, Lords and King alike could not really ignore. Sir R. Peel showed his full appreciation of the position when, after dissolving Parliament, he recognised in 1835 that by failing to obtain a majority, though he had improved his position in the Commons, he had placed himself in a position in which he must resign, because he had not authority to carry on the administration. It is significant that Lord Melbourne (h) suggested that it would be impossible to carry on government without the rotten boroughs which the Act of 1832 swept away, so little could he realise the essential character of the new system which was being created (i). It is significant also that he never fully appreciated the new position; when he resigned in 1841 after an unsuccessful dissolution, regarded by him and the Queen as an appeal by the latter to the people to return her ministry to authority, he advised the Queen to state that she had only parted with her ministers in deference to the opinion of Parliament, though she still had confidence in them (k). Naturally she did not realise any more than her retiring Premier that in the nature of things the verdict of the electors deprived her of the right to feel confidence in ministers of whom the voters had disapproved, that it was no longer a question of personal integrity or sagacity in a minister, but of his right to represent the will of the people, as expressed by the suffrages of the electorate.

(g) 2 & 3 Will. IV. cc. 45, 65, 88. The electorate was increased by 217,600, say, 49 per cent. (h) Greville, Journals, ii. 277.

(i) "For Scotland it was political birth, the beginning of a duty and a power": Morley, Gladstone, iii. 535.

(k) Letters, 1 s., i. 307 ff.

Even before the reform issue became urgent, the duty of the Crown to act against personal inclination on the advice of ministers had been established definitively by the action of George IV. in assenting to the Act to establish Catholic emancipation (l). The King made every effort to escape the duty, and he had the precedent of George III., who had consistently in the case of England denied his duty to break his coronation oath, as he held, by assent to such a measure. Times, however, had changed, and the King found that he could find no ministry which would take responsibility for governing if he refused to accept emancipation. This was soon followed by the issue of reform. The King was most reluctant to agree to swamp the Upper House, but he promised to do so, when he found that no ministry could be found to replace that of Earl Grey. In both cases the position was plain. The Commons, unreformed as it was, was so far responsive to the voice of the country as to refuse to support a ministry which was determined to govern against that voice. The Reform Act made that voice more fully articulate and brought the member of Parliament under periodic control.

3. The Separation of Cabinet and Council.

The composition of the Cabinet was throughout this period of evolution in process of change as it became differentiated from the Council. The term Cabinet under Charles I. (m) is not rare to denote either a Committee of the Council or a special group of advisers in the royal confidence. Under Charles II. the position of the Council as the body which discusses and decides affairs of State is plain, but there are Committees of that body which deal with special aspects, especially foreign affairs, and report for final settlement to the Council (n). At the close of his reign, after the abortive experiment of a representative Council sponsored by Sir W.

(l) Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, p. 81.

(m) Turner, Cabinet Council, 1622—1784, i. 19 ff., 22 ff.

(n) Turner, i. 52 ff., 94 ff., 113 ff.

Temple (o), we find mention of the Cabinet composed of those great officers and courtiers whom the King relied on for the interior despatch of his business (p), and who had the transaction of most actions of government, foreign and domestic. No doubt in its weekly meetings the policy which would finally be adopted in Council was determined. William III. (q) relied too much on himself to constitute a Cabinet with wide authority; we find him regarding the Cabinet as a rather formal body, while he consulted, not in Cabinet, with a few specially chosen ministers. But Lord Sunderland in 1701 appears already with a clear conception of a Cabinet which the King should regularly consult, composed of the great officers of State, and in 1692 (r) it was assumed in the Commons that one source of the unsatisfactory position of foreign relations was the fact that the Council accepted, without knowing the reasons, policies devised by the Cabinet. Hence the attempt in the Act of Settlement, 1701, to remedy the situation by requiring that matters properly cognisable by the Privy Council should be transacted therein, and all resolutions taken should be signed by the members assenting thereto. That provision and the equally (s) injudicious effort to exclude not merely ordinary office holders, but ministers of State from the Commons never became operative. The fate of the Council was very different. Under Anne the process already in operation under William III. becomes complete, or nearly so. The Council, styled Privy Council or Great Council, meets under the Queen for formal approval of business which has been worked through by a Committee of Council, at which the Queen may be present, while the Cabinet, wherein the Queen sits, takes the essential decisions. The Council, however, was destined to act once more in a deliberative capacity on July 30th, 1714, when the Queen was dying. Lord Oxford had indeed been dismissed, but his place as Lord

(o) Turner, i. 341 ff.; cf. 109 ff., 113 ff.

(p) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 94 f.

(q) Anson, i. 95 ff.

(s) Jenks, Parl. England, pp. 115 ff.

(r) 5 Parl. Hist. 731.

Treasurer had not been filled, and until this was done he might be held to be legally in office, and thus on the Queen's death to be under the Act of Succession a member of the Regency Council. But the Whig Dukes of Somerset and Argyll entered the Council Chamber unbidden, and took charge, with the Duke of Shrewsbury, of the situation. Under their guidance the Council advised the appointment of the Duke of Shrewsbury as Lord Treasurer (t).

Under George I., as already mentioned, the Cabinet soon became dissociated from the Council in form through the constant absence of the King, and the King also ceased to attend meetings of the Committees of Council. Another formal distinction goes back probably to the initiation of the Cabinet system; its members down to the creation of a Cabinet Secretariat in 1916 were summoned as His Majesty's servants by the instructions of the Premier or other leading minister, by a secretary (u), while Council and Council Committee meetings were called on instructions by the Clerk of the Council.

The Hanoverian Cabinet (x), however, appears definitely to have been a comparatively large body, whose members were summoned mainly to approve decisions already taken by the inner Cabinet, which on occasion was composed merely of Robert Walpole, the Chancellor, and the two Secretaries of State. This division is attested under Grenville also, and formally the distinction was marked by the fact that the inner circle only had the circulation of important papers in Cabinet boxes, to which they had keys. In 1771 the Duke of Grafton, while accepting the Privy Seal, stipulated that he should not be summoned to meetings of the confidential Cabinet. The position was clearly explained by Lord Mansfield in 1775, when he repudiated responsibility for any action since the close of the Grenville ministry on the score that he had ceased since then to be a member of the efficient Cabinet, though he remained a member of the Cabinet (y). This, of course, was a position wholly incompatible with collective responsibility, and one quite in keeping with the ideas of George III., who desired to destroy party, and who was glad to have Cabinet ministers whom he might consult, though they were not in harmony with the inner circle of ministers.

(t) Michael, England under George I., i. 52 ff. See also Anson, i. 104 ff.

(u) Turner, Cabinet Council, 1622—1784, ii. 71 ff.

(x) Turner, ii. 304—378.

The disappearance of this anomaly begins with the ministry of Lord Rockingham, composed of eleven members, each holding high office. In 1801 the principle that only a member of the efficient Cabinet is a true Cabinet member is asserted by Addington (z) as against Lord Loughborough who, though no longer Lord Chancellor, retained his Cabinet key and attended Cabinet meetings. A last survival of the older régime may be seen in the Grand or Honorary Cabinet, summoned in 1806 before the opening of Parliament, to hear the draft of the royal speech read, a function later dropped. The Archbishop of Canterbury, formerly a regular member of the greater Cabinet, then appeared presumably for the last time at a Cabinet.

The irresponsibility of Cabinet members for policy adopted by the Cabinet appears from Lord Camden's repudiation (a) of responsibility for the measures taken against Wilkes in regard to the Middlesex election, and the imposition of the fatal tea duty in 1770 on the American colonies, and the Duke of Grafton, while complaining of the attitude of Lord Camden in respect of a matter to which the whole Cabinet consented, explained, quite inconsistently, that the tax was no measure of his; in fact he, as Premier, had been out-voted. How little Cabinet responsibility was understood in 1806 appeared in the discussion of the membership of the Cabinet given to Lord Ellenborough, the Lord Chief Justice, which was challenged on the ground that as member of the Cabinet he might be responsible for the decision to take legal proceedings over which he would have to preside as judge. But Lord Temple denied Cabinet responsibility, and Fox maintained the advantage of fixing it upon an individual minister as such (b). This point of view is clearly explained by the fact that legal responsibility was in the minds of those concerned. Impeachment of an individual was a living possibility, but it was difficult even for the judicious Hallam (c) to conceive how an impeachment for sitting as a Cabinet councillor could be drawn.

(y) 18 Parl. Hist. 274 f., 279.

(z) Campbell, Lives of the Chancellors, vi. 326 f.

(a) Grafton, Memoirs, p. 246.

With collective responsibility was closely connected the restriction of membership of the Cabinet to ministers with administrative duties. The old Cabinet had contained members, such as the Archbishop, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Master of the Horse (d), but Pitt's Cabinet in 1784 was composed of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, whose position was assured by custom, the First Lords of the Treasury and Admiralty, and the two Secretaries of State, who in 1782 had stood out as ministers for home and foreign affairs, and not, as they once were, mere mouthpieces of the Council. In 1801 to these members are added a third Secretary of State, whose creation the war had necessitated, and who dealt with war and the colonies, the Master of the Ordnance, the President of the Board of Control to represent Indian issues, a minister to deal with trade and the post office, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a sinecure office. The tradition was already becoming established that a Cabinet should contain just so many members as were desirable for the effective control of business, and that places must be found for the heads of the great administrative departments of State.

It remained, however, still possible for ministers in the Cabinet to differ in view on substantial issues, as when in Lord Liverpool's Government the Home Secretary opposed,

(b) 6 Parl. Deb. 308 ff.

(c) Hist. iii. 187.

(d) Cf. Turner, Cabinet Council, 1622—1784, ii. 358 ff.

the Foreign Secretary favoured, Catholic emancipation. After the contact with the electorate was established by the Reform Act, such differences ceased to be tolerable, and we find Mr. Gladstone in 1868 (e) telling an anecdote, showing how Lord Melbourne appreciated the necessity of unanimity towards the world. Lord John Russell's famous letter on free trade from Edinburgh threatened to dissolve the Cabinet, when Lord Melbourne ended all discussion by saying: "Well, gentlemen, there is no doubt that John Russell's letter is a d---d letter: but he has written it, and we must go through with it." Although, of course, in opposition such unanimity is less essential, for attack can take varied forms not all consistent, without ceasing to be effective, Sir R. Peel, feeling that the Conservatives were hampered in their attitude to the Municipal Corporations Bill by the divergence of view between the Lords' and the Commons' supporters of the Conservative faith, summoned to consider the like measure for Ireland the members of the late Cabinet (f).

(e) Letters, 2 s., i. 563.

(f) G. K. Clark, Peel, p. 345.

CHAPTER II.

THE FORMATION AND DISSOLUTION OF THE CABINET.

1. The Selection of the Prime Minister.

It follows from the development of Cabinet government that the formation of a Cabinet depends essentially on the royal choice of a Prime Minister. Occasion for such action may arise on the death of the incumbent of the office, or on his resignation. In the latter case the ground of that resignation is necessarily a factor of prime importance. If it is occasioned by ill-health or the burden of age or tiredness, then normally no question arises of a change in the political complexion of the ministry. If, on the other hand, it is the outcome of defeat in the House of Commons or at a general election or the imminence of such a defeat, then a change of ministry involves normally recourse to the opposition in the House of Commons. But in every case the King has some measure of freedom of choice, though normally within very narrow limits. It is essential that the Prime Minister shall be able to form a Government which can secure a vote of confidence if need be from the Commons, and the sovereign must fix finally upon a politician thus qualified. But there may be more than one politician capable of such action, and it must always be remembered that the power to award high office gives the nominee of the Crown a considerable measure of power to secure support. It is significant that, when Mr. Asquith in 1916 was forced out of office by able manœuvres (a), several ministers whose personal obligations to him were patent found that the call of public duty compelled them, however reluctantly, to accept even minor offices in the new administration (b). On the other hand, party ties are often strong enough to resist such persuasion; thus Mr. R. MacDonald in 1931 was unable to carry over to the new National Government which he formed the services of any of the able young men of the Labour party, such as Mr. H. Morrison or the late Mr. W. Graham.

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 272 ff. Lord Balfour's treatment of Mr. Asquith remains inexplicable: see Dugdale, ii. 170 ff.

The royal choice prior to 1923 might fall on a peer or a commoner as circumstances might dictate. In the early days of democratic rule the arguments against a peer were of slight weight, even though the fact that the strife of parties (c) was mainly carried on in the Commons, suggested to the Duke of Wellington his refusal to accept office in 1834, and his support for the appointment of Sir R. Peel instead. It was only the growth of democracy and the fact that Parliament came to be deeply engaged in social problems which rendered the presence of the Prime Minister in the Lower House more and more desirable. There may be adduced in favour of the selection of a peer as Prime Minister the consideration that he is set free to concentrate on essential problems, as a result of detachment from the burden of constant attendance in the Commons. There is no reason to suppose that the arrangement worked badly in 1835—41 under Lord Melbourne, in 1852, 1858—59 and 1866—68 under Lord Derby, in 1865—66 under Earl Russell, or in 1876—80 under Lord Beaconsfield. It is true that Lord Rosebery proved a definite failure as Prime Minister in 1894—95, but that was due to personal defects of temperament coupled with the fact that Sir William Harcourt had naturally hoped to succeed Mr. Gladstone, and accepted the refusal of his colleagues to admit his claims, not merely with a very bad grace, but also on conditions which resulted in rendering more than usually difficult the position of leader (d). Mr. Gladstone himself in 1894 (e) was not

(b) Spender, op. cit. ii. 288.

(c) Peel, Memoirs, ii. 19.

(d) Gardiner, Harcourt, ii. 271 ff.; Letters, 3 s., ii. 373, 375 f.

(e) Letters, 3 s., ii. 369.

opposed to a peer as successor, and, if asked, would have recommended Lord Spencer for royal favour, nor would the choice have been unwise. Lord Salisbury in his terms of office, 1885—86, 1886—92, and 1895—1902, was unquestionably not an ideal head of the Government, but it would be impossible to suggest that the control could better have been entrusted to other hands; his nephew's tenure of office was far less successful, and ended in disaster in 1905. It was energetically contended in 1905 by Sir E. Grey, Mr. Haldane, and even by Mr. Asquith (f), that it would be proper for Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman to lead the party and control the Government from the Upper House, and there is little doubt that his decision against medical advice and that of the King led to his enforced resignation in 1908, when he was dying. In the controversy of 1916 (g) the suggestion was pressed on Mr. Asquith himself that he should cease to attempt to combine the duties of final control of the war operations with that of leader of the Commons, on the ground that the burden was too great for any man, and Mr. Lloyd George as Prime Minister did not attempt to perform the usual functions of the leader of the Commons. His failure, however, to resume this function effectively after the close of the war proved to have reacted fatally on his hold on the Commons in 1922, when the Chanak episode undermined the position of the ministry, already menaced by the Irish settlement of 1921. The personal touch with members necessary to secure a rally to the Government in such an emergency was lacking, and the fall of the ministry became inevitable.

It was largely this precedent which determined the fate of Lord Curzon in 1923 when Mr. Bonar Law resigned through ill-health (h). It is true that the position of a Prime Minister in the Upper House had become more difficult through the developments of the Parliamentary position even (f) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 172—174; Campbell-Bannerman, ii. 188 ff.

(g) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 253 ff.

(h) H. Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 353 ff.

since 1902. The House of Lords had grown more and more Conservative since the split of the Liberal party on Home Rule in 1886, while the extension of the franchise in 1867 and 1884, and, above all, 1918, had accentuated the democratic character of the Commons, whose supremacy over the Lords was established by the Parliament Act, 1911. It was certainly possible to base the refusal to appoint Lord Curzon on the plea that the official opposition was essentially in the Commons, and weight no doubt attached to this consideration; it may be said that the head of the ministry should be prepared to fight his own contests against the adverse forces. But this argument must be taken with reserve. It is perfectly possible to hold that the burden of leadership in the Commons is too grievous to permit of the exercise of calm statesmanship, and that the head of the ministry ought to be to some extent detached from leadership of the party. But this is far removed from the spirit of party politics, and in Lord Curzon's case the scales were heavily weighted against him by his personality. Whatever he might be to his intimates, to the outside world he presented an appearance of Olympian aloofness and conveyed the impression of overweening self-confidence, which rendered men unwilling to serve under him. No doubt, however, it was the earnest advice of Earl Balfour which determined the King to refuse him the office he deemed his services no less than his abilities marked as his due; it is significant that Earl Balfour never revealed to his friend (i) the part he had so deliberately played in destroying his ambition. The precedent, however, must be regarded as decisive under any normal circumstances, for as matters stand there is slight probability that any peer will possess such claims to preferment as then were Lord Curzon's. Moreover, it is significant that Earl Baldwin did not show the slightest desire to continue his Premiership with transfer to the Upper House, though such a decision would certainly have been popular enough in the country after he had established his reputation by his brilliant handling of the abdication of Edward VIII. None-the-less, it remains possible that a Prime Minister might retain that office after transfer to the Upper House, though the selection of a peer for that office would be abnormal.

(i) Dugdale, ii. 362. Lord Curzon's age was another difficulty.

In the circumstances of 1923 there can be little doubt that the King had a definite, if limited, possibility of selection; if he had commissioned Lord Curzon, it is probable that he would have succeeded without great difficulty in securing colleagues; ex post facto judgments on these issues are not of great value; Mr. Lloyd George in 1916 found his way easy, once he had authority to offer posts. In many cases, no doubt, the sovereign has no alternative (k), for the choice may be definitely fixed for him by the fact that party favour determines who must lead. Thus, on Lord Palmerston's death in 1865, Earl Russell was patently the only possible choice (l); three years later Lord Derby's resignation left Mr. Disraeli without a rival (m); no one doubted (n) that Mr. Asquith in 1908 must replace Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and the transition from Mr. MacDonald to Mr. Baldwin in 1935 was as inevitable as Mr. N. Chamberlain's succession in 1937. The case was really as obvious in 1880 (o), when Queen Victoria should, in accordance with the patent fact that Mr. Gladstone was the architect of the Liberal victory, have offered him the Premiership. Unhappily by that time the Queen had imbibed a deep distrust of Mr. Gladstone from her late Premier, and she endeavoured therefore to obtain Lord Hartington for the office. It was clearly an unfortunate step, for it had not the excuse that Lord Hartington was in any sense the acknowledged head of the party. It is true that he was the leader of the (k) In 1859 Lord Palmerston was the obvious choice, but the Queen endeavoured to induce him and Lord John Russell to serve under Lord Granville, quite in vain: Bell, Palmerston, ii. 215 f.; Letters, 1 s., iii. 343 ff.

(l) Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 486.

(m) Letters, 2 s., i. 496 ff.

(n) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 228; Lee, Edward VII, ii. 578 f.

(o) Letters, 2 s., m. 80 ff.; Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. xi. f.; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 620—624.

party in the Commons by election, but the Queen had never thought of the doctrine that a leader should be in the Commons, and her late Prime Minister had been elevated to the Lords. Moreover, as Mr. Gladstone indicated, if the Queen did not care to face the necessity of offering him the office, she could properly have applied to Earl Granville (p), to whom Mr. Gladstone held that he had handed over the leadership of the party, and who was party leader in the Lords. The unanimity of both possible leaders that Mr. Gladstone must be chosen compelled the surrender of the Queen, but not until relations between her Prime Minister and herself had been rendered difficult. The position was very different in 1894; it may be that the majority of the Cabinet was anxious to see Lord Rosebery chosen in place of Sir W. Harcourt; but Lord Spencer was highly esteemed, and, supported by Mr. Gladstone's recommendation, could easily have formed an effective ministry. The Queen, however, was personally attached to Lord Rosebery, and her choice, though it proved unlucky, was quite natural (q).

Much more latitude is available to the Crown in cases where there are no clear cut party divisions, presenting the sovereign with nothing more than the choice of a leader from a party clearly entitled to hold office. It is not rare in British history for differing combinations to be possible, and for Governments to be formed and live without clear majorities, so that they are exposed to defeat, entailing the resignation of the Prime Minister, although the opposition has no clear plurality of votes. The Conservative split on protection entailed the fall of Sir R. Peel in 1846, and the Peelites long after added confusion to politics by the uncertainty of their action. By combining with the Whigs in 1852 they defeated Lord Derby (r). Personal feeling has also played a considerable

(p) It was assumed by almost all the Press that she would do so: Letters, 2 s., in. 77.

(q) Letters, 3 s., ii. 370; Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 90 f.

(r) Letters, 1 s., ii. 412 f. On their disturbing effect, see Morley, Gladstone, i. 551 f., 558, 567.

part in the destruction of ministries; it was Lord Palmerston's resentment at his removal from office by Lord John Russell that brought down the ministry of 1852 (s), while Lord John Russell was no doubt influenced by like sentiments when he acted so strangely in 1855 and compelled Lord Aberdeen to resign (t). The defeat of Lord Palmerston in 1857 on the issue of his treatment of China led merely to his successful dissolution, but the self-confidence thence engendered came into conflict with unreasoning prejudice next year, when he endeavoured to make reasonable reparation for the impunity hitherto extended to plotters on British territory, by proposing a bill to penalise incitement to murder (u). This led to minority government until 1859, and Earl Russell's unlucky reform proposals in 1866 (x) saw a further two years of minority rule. A period of comparatively strong Governments was ended in 1885—86 by Lord Salisbury's first term of office, but his second term was secured from interruption by the fact that the Liberal Unionists became rapidly, in all but name and organisation, Conservatives. From 1910 until coalition was formed in 1915 the Liberal Government was kept in office by the support of the Irish Nationalists, its independent majority disappearing at the election of January, 1910. The Labour Government of 1924 was frankly a minority ministry, supported during its brief existence by Liberal complaisance, and that of 1929—31 was in like case. From 1852 to 1855 Lord Aberdeen's ministry was a frank coalition, as was the ministry reconstructed by Mr. Asquith in 1915, and again altered by Mr. Lloyd George a year later. But the ministry of Lord Salisbury, followed by Mr. Balfour of 1895—1905, consisted of two elements, differing in no serious regard, and its dissolution had nothing to do with the fact that it included Conservatives and Liberal Unionists; and the National Government of 1931 to the present date, while in its origin a genuine coalition, soon passed over into virtually a (s) Letters, 1 s., ii. 366—368.

(u) Ibid. ii. 180 ff.

(t) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 108 f.
(x) Letters, 2 s., i. 331 ff.

Conservative ministry, supporting by Conservative votes a small number of ex-Liberals, and a handful of ex-Labour members.

When, as in these instances, ministries lack essential cohesion, the fall of the Government inevitably creates a situation in which the sovereign must exercise personal judgment. It is, however, obviously proper that the sovereign should ask the leader of the party which has brought about the fall of a ministry to take office, and the leader has a prima facie obligation to assume the burden, for it is plainly contrary to the interests of the country that the Government should be one discredited by failure, and a defeated ministry cannot be expected to be willing to remain in office when their proposals are rejected. It may, of course, prove impossible for the leader to form a ministry. In 1851 Lord Stanley (y) failed to do so, with the result that Lord John Russell struggled on until 1852, when Lord Derby was more successful (z), though his ministry was in a minority. On his failure to secure a majority at the general election the appointment of Lord Aberdeen was rendered obvious by the fact that both the Whigs and the Peelites were willing to serve under him. But Lord Derby advised the Queen to send for Lord Lansdowne on tactical grounds, eliciting from her consort the contention (a) that the matter was within her discretion and not a case for official advice. She secured, however, his concurrence in the proposal to consult the two peers together, but the plan miscarried through the ill-health of Lord Lansdowne, and Lord Aberdeen accepted office when this point was made clear. On the collapse of his ministry, with the defection of Lord John Russell on Mr. Roebuck's demand for a Committee of Enquiry into the conduct of war in the Crimea, the Queen turned to Lord Derby, on the natural ground that he was the head of the largest party in the Commons, which by its vote for the motion had caused the resignation of the Government. Lord Derby (b) countered this claim by pointing out that his party has not sponsored the motion, nor arranged it with the mover, and, as he could not form a coalition, he refused to take office. Lord John Russell (c) found it impossible to secure support, and Lord Palmerston (d) had to be asked to re-unite the Whigs and the Peelites, which he did for the moment, though his determination to accept the duty of acting on Mr. Roebuck's demand cost him the services of the leaders of the Peelites immediately afterwards.

(y) Letters, 1 s., ii. 289 ff.

(z) Letters, 1 s., ii. 369 ff.; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 59 ff.

(a) Letters, 1 s., ii. 413.

The Queen's readiness to apply to the leader of the opposition was affirmed again in favour of Lord Derby in 1858 and 1866, though on both occasions the ministry which was formed had to be a minority Government, dependent for its existence on the inability of its opponents to unite to eject it from office. On Lord Derby's resignation, her selection of Mr. Disraeli, who had been the driving power of the ministry, as his successor was inevitable, and her regard for him led to her abortive offer in 1873 (discussed below), and her appointment of him to office in 1874. In 1880, as we have seen, Mr. Gladstone's effective leadership of the opposition was ignored in favour of the party leader in the Commons, a step quite properly disapproved by Mr. Gladstone as obviously motived by the desire to keep him out of office. In 1885 the selection of Lord Salisbury as Prime Minister was justified by the fact that, while not technically leader of the party, he was leader in the Lords, and his position was patently dominant, as compared with that of Sir S. Northcote, whom the Queen had recognised privately as leader in 1881 (e).

In 1886 the Queen should naturally have offered power to Mr. Gladstone as the leader of the party whose support of the amendment of Mr. Jesse Collings, the advocate of the ideal of "three acres and a cow," had caused the defeat of the ministry in the Commons. But the Queen had already

(b) Letters, 1 s., iii. 79 ff.
 (d) Letters, 1 s., iii. 96 ff.

(c) Letters, 1 s., iii. 88 ff.
 (e) Letters, 2 s., iii. 218 f., 659 f.

striven to keep Lord Salisbury in power by appeals (f) to such Liberals as Mr. Goschen, Mr. W. E. Forster, and Lord Hartington, and Lord Salisbury accepted responsibility for advising her that she might consult Mr. Goschen (g). The Queen, in making this proposal, relied on the precedent of 1851 and 1855. In the former case the Queen had seen Lord Lansdowne before she sent for Lord Stanley, and Lord Lansdowne, who was leader of the House of Lords, and Lord John Russell discussed the situation with her before the latter formally resigned (h). After Lord Stanley refused to accept office, the Queen consulted the Duke of Wellington after informal discussion with the Prince Consort (i). In 1855 the Queen at once sent for Lord Derby, in accordance with the opinion of Lord Aberdeen, and consulted Lord Lansdowne only after Lord Derby's intimation that he could not form a ministry (j). It is, therefore, clear that the precedents relied on by the Queen lacked any close similarity to the situation as regards Mr. Goschen, but patently precedents are not of decisive value. The emergence of new situations justifies departure from precedent, and the Queen's action must be judged on its merits. On that ground the case was poor. Mr. Goschen (k) virtually refused to visit the Queen, urging her to send for Mr. Gladstone, thus showing that he felt the duty of the Crown to be clear. Lord Salisbury, though he thought that Mr. Goschen should have visited the Queen, and that Sir H. Ponsonby should see him, nevertheless realised that, in the circumstances, the Queen could not withhold an offer, seeing that Mr. Gladstone had not publicly committed himself to a policy of Home Rule (l). Had he done so, he suggested that the matter might be open to consideration. In face of this opinion and the attitude of Mr. Goschen, the Queen naturally had no option but to offer office to Mr. Gladstone, very adroitly covering her position by asserting that she had (f) Letters, 2 s., iii. 714 ff.

(h) Letters, 1 s., ii. 290.

(j) Letters, 1 s., iii. 85 ff.

(l) Letters, 3 s., i. 27.

(g) Letters, 3 s., i. 24, 26.

(i) Letters, 1 s., ii. 295.

(k) Letters, 3 s., i. 29—31, 33 f.

understood that he was anxious to retire from public life, and that her offer left him free to accept or not as he thought best.

It is clear that, as matters stood, the Queen would have been well advised to make the offer forthwith to Mr. Gladstone, because her failure to do so conveyed inevitably the impression that she was not impartial in her attitude towards him, and in fact we know that she was not free from bias against his policy. The matter, however, might have presented a different appearance if Mr. Gladstone had actually announced his conversion to Home Rule. It could then have been argued, as recognised by Lord Salisbury, that the political situation was so uncertain that it was perfectly proper to consult Mr. Goschen to see whether a Government of a moderate character might be formed. Even so, no doubt it would have been better to make the offer to Mr. Gladstone in order to conform to the practice of the Queen in regard to Lord Derby. But it is safer in constitutional issues to insist on substance rather than on form, and to agree with Mr. Goschen that the Queen's duty to approach Mr. Gladstone was imposed by the realities of the political situation, as Lord Salisbury himself agreed.

In a brief period the Queen again consulted Mr. Goschen as to whether, on the resignation of Mr. Gladstone as the result of the general election, she should send for Lord Salisbury, and received his emphatic advice (m) to that effect, showing that Mr. Goschen saw no objection to being consulted when this took place under circumstances precluding any idea of unfairness. In 1892 the question of sending for Mr. Gladstone caused anxiety to the Queen, who at one time had thought of sending for Lord Rosebery, and Sir H. Ponsonby sounded Sir W. Harcourt and other minor lights of the opposition, learning of course that they held Mr. Gladstone the only possible choice, a view which Lord

(m) Letters, 3 s., i. 161.

Rosebery had earlier made quite clear to Sir H. Ponsonby (n). In the result, the Queen abandoned the idea of seeing Lord Rosebery before acting, and sent for Mr. Gladstone, but her attitude shows clearly that she did not accept the view that she was not entitled to consider independently whom she should choose for office. No doubt, in her final decision she was influenced by the argument, pointed out by Sir H. Ponsonby, that if she selected Lord Rosebery and he refused she would be placed in the unpleasant position of seeming to have been compelled to resort to Mr. Gladstone. In fact nothing but success in securing a ministry would prevent the sovereign from being placed in a difficult position in such a case. But the difficulty must not be exaggerated, nor is it necessary to deny the right of the Crown to weigh possibilities. Mr. Balfour's view in 1904 (o), that in the event of his resignation the King should send for Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman in lieu of Lord Spencer, was simply in accord with common sense, for by that date Lord Spencer's position in the Liberal party could not compare for a moment to that of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman (p). On the other hand, it is quite impossible to accept Lord Esher's claim (q) that it would have been unconstitutional for the King to have sent for Lord Spencer and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and to have discussed the issue with them together. The duty of a sovereign is unquestionably not to take sides, and subject to that, the Crown must be free to make such enquiries as seem best calculated to ascertain who can form a ministry. To disapprove the Queen's soundings in 1892 is impossible, and the King in 1905 might quite properly have seen Lord Spencer with Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, though, as matters turned out, he had already made social contacts with the latter abroad, and had, naturally, no real doubt that he should send for him.

(n) Letters, 3 s., ii. 130 ff.

(o) Esher, Journals, ii. 38.

(p) Halévy's assertion (Hist. 1905—15, p. 3) that up to September, 1905, Lord Spencer was universally expected to be Premier is quite mistaken. In October he became incapacitated by illness.

(q) Esher, Journals, ii. 77 f.

The principle that consultation is proper, provided that it is intended simply to ascertain who best can form a Government is in accordance with common sense, and is also exemplified by many instances, though these do not involve so directly the question of the preferential claim of the leader of the opposition to a summons. An outgoing Prime Minister who retires voluntarily or from ill-health may naturally be expected to recommend his successor, and even if he resigns because of a defeat in the Commons or at the polls, he is the natural person to express an opinion. It is perfectly true that he has no right to advise, because the right to advise, as the Prince Consort recognised in 1852 (r), when Lord Derby was defeated in the Commons, is correlative to the taking of responsibility for the advice. But, though the Queen was fully within her rights when she refrained from asking Mr. Gladstone's advice in 1894 (s), as he was within his rights in refusing to give it to Sir H. Ponsonby except at the royal request, that attitude was no doubt affected by the royal prejudice against the aged Premier. In 1868 Lord Derby recommended spontaneously Mr. Disraeli, and, if Lord Salisbury in 1902 did not formally (t) recommend Mr. Balfour, that was doubtless because such a recommendation was patently unnecessary. Mr. Balfour's views in favour of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman were before the King, and he must have known that Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman regarded Mr. Asquith as his obvious successor (u). Lord Esher (x), indeed, insisted on principle that the King must make his own decision without learning the view of the Cabinet as desired by Lord Knollys, but Lord Esher's views on such topics were often too personal to be accurate. Mr. Asquith naturally advised the formation of the first coalition under (r) Letters, 1 s., ii. 413. Lord Salisbury advised in 1886 (Letters, 3 s., i. 27).

(s) Letters, 3 s. ii. 369. The Queen sent a handsome apology to Lord Salisbury for not offering him office at once: ibid. 368.

(t) This point is not recorded. But cf. Holland, Devonshire, ii. 280. His inevitability is attested by Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 611.

(u) Cf. his interviews with both on March, 4th 1908: Spender, i. 194, 195.

(x) Journals, ii. 272 f.

himself in 1915, after, by resignation, securing a free hand to reconstruct the ministry, and he repeated this action in the crisis of 1916, when it was still hoped to effect a reconstruction which would not mean his retirement (y). In the later stages of the issue it is clear that the King had full opportunity to learn the views of Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Bonar Law, and that Mr. Asquith took the decision to recommend an offer of office to Mr. Bonar Law seems certain, though Mr. Chamberlain seems to have thought otherwise (z). It seems clear that in 1922 Mr. Lloyd George could not avoid indicating that Mr. Bonar Law must be his successor, for it was he who, issuing from retirement under the influence of Lord Beaverbrook, had announced his attitude of disapproval of the coalition at the decisive meeting of the party. On the other hand, Mr. Bonar Law himself did not advise (a), and presumably was not asked his view; no doubt, he wished to avoid giving any lead against Lord Curzon, and preferred to be exempt from any responsibility for the decision to pass him over.

The precedent of discussion in 1916 was clearly followed in 1931. The financial crisis induced by the reckless financial policy of the ministry, aggravated by the international financial situation, threatened the ministry, a minority Government, with disaster from the prospect of a calamitous failure to maintain the gold standard. The Prime Minister advised the King to see Mr. Baldwin and Sir A. Sinclair, the leaders of the opposition parties, on August 23rd, on his return from Balmoral, and after they had done so, the Prime Minister met his colleagues in Cabinet, and the decision was taken to resign. The general expectation was that this step would be followed by the sending for the leader of the Conservatives, but the result was different. When he presented to the King the resignation of the Cabinet, Mr. MacDonald recommended him to send for the leaders of the opposition on August 24th, and the outcome of that meeting was the Prime Minister's receiving authority to create a new Government based on party co-operation (b). That the King was active in procuring this result while limiting himself entirely to his constitutional right of suggestion (c), is generally conceded, and, whatever judgment may be passed on the attitude of Mr. MacDonald, the correctness of the royal attitude is certain. The new Government once established, the transit of power to Mr. Baldwin in 1935, and thence with automatic precision to Mr. Chamberlain in 1937, was automatic; in both cases it may be taken for granted that their predecessors advocated royal appointment.

(y) Spender, ii. 164 ff., 273 ff. (z) Down the Years, p. 125.
(a) Ronaldshay, Curzon, iii. 350; Dugdale, Balfour, ii. 360.

A problem of great difficulty is raised by the question of the character and extent of the obligation created by the offer of office by the Crown. No doubt politicians are specially interested in the necessity that the King's service must be carried on; their métier demands that they should be astute to promote the maintenance of orderly government on democratic lines; it is on the tacit assumption that this is their standpoint that they have been returned to Parliament. Hence the political leader is bound to avoid anything pointing to the destruction of effective administration, but the responsibility is not confined to the opposition. The Government is equally bound so to order its policy, as to prevent the country suffering from the régime of a discredited administration, lacking the power to act effectively in the interests of the State. The obligation is increased in intensity by the gravity of international problems at the present day. In the face of dictatorships under the control of resolute leaders, a British ministry, barely clinging to office, is plainly a national danger. Hence, it follows that neither Government nor opposition should so direct its policy as to render probable such an outcome.

(b) Snowden, Autobiography, n. 947—954.

(c) S. Webb, Political Quarterly, m. 1 ff.; Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. 149 ff.

The issue arose in 1851, when the Government of Lord John Russell suffered defeat on a motion on the franchise by Mr. Locke King. Lord Stanley was clearly not responsible for the motion of radical inspiration, and naturally he suggested to his sovereign that the true remedy was the forming of a coalition between the Whigs and the Peelites (d). It must, however, be added that he felt it his duty as a loyal subject to risk everything, except his principles and his honour to carry on the Government (e). His fortitude was not then tested, but his attitude explains his acceptance in 1852 of the duty of forming a Government when Lord Palmerston brought down the Government. On the other hand, in 1855 the case for his taking office was stronger, for his party had provided the votes which carried Mr. Roebuck's motion and defeated the ministry. His attitude (f) was decidedly open to criticism, for he attempted to evade responsibility, and though he tried to form a Government he speedily declared it impossible to do so. He was equally reluctant in 1858 (g), when Lord Palmerston was defeated, but the Queen very reasonably pressed him to act on the obvious ground that the existing ministry felt, as a result of its defeat, discredited and unable to govern successfully, and that he controlled a party, whence a Government acceptable to the country could be formed.

The issue was decisively raised in 1873 (h) by Mr. Disraeli's refusal to take office after his party had defeated Mr. Gladstone on the Irish University Bill. Mr. Disraeli was motived by considerations of electoral advantage; he had no desire to take up the arduous task of finishing off current business and then going to the country on a policy of his own, realising acutely the advantages of forcing Mr. Gladstone to remain in office in difficult conditions, with the probability of suffering serious

(d) Letters, 1 s., ii. 290 ff.

(e) Letters, 1 s., ii. 369.

(g) Letters, 1 s., iii. 266 ff.; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 180 ff.

(h) Guedalla, i. 395 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 450 ff., 652 f.

(f) Letters, 1 s., iii. 80.

defeat when he went to the polls. His plea that having been in opposition he had no issues to frame was clearly untenable. Mr. Gladstone naturally pressed the proposition that the logical sequel to a deliberate defeat of a major Governmental measure must be acceptance of the duty of forming a ministry, and cited as precedents Lord Grey's acceptance of office on defeating the Duke of Wellington in 1830, and the events of 1835, of 1841, of 1852, of 1858, of 1859, of 1866, and of 1868, in each of which the opposition had accepted the duty of taking office. He admitted exceptions in 1832, in 1851, and in 1855, but insisted that the opposition failure then to form ministries had been due to inability, not reluctance, a statement rather exaggerated as regards 1851, but that, it must be remembered, was a case where the defeat of the ministry was incidental, not deliberately planned as in 1873. Mr. Disraeli conceded that it would be an act of recklessness and faction for an opposition to throw out legislation when it knew it was not prepared to take office, if its aim was merely to destroy the Government. But he insisted that the circumstances precluded his taking office forthwith, and that it was impossible to accept the proposition that an opposition could be forced into acceptance of objectionable legislation by reason of the fact that the Parliamentary situation was such as to preclude its acceptance of office. The defence in vacuo might be deserving of serious consideration; in the actual instance it had little cogency, the principle is clearly sound that, if the opposition is unwilling to take office, with a view to an early dissolution, it should bear in mind that it is bound to great discretion in criticism, and of such discretion nothing whatever had been shown on the Irish Universities Bill. Mr. Gladstone reiterated the doctrine in 1880 (i), when he advised Lord Hartington, for whom the Queen had sent, that it was his duty either to take office or to advise the choice of another Premier, and that, if the latter refused, he would still be bound to undertake the formation of a ministry. In like spirit Lord Salisbury consented to take office in 1885 (k), though he had a better excuse than Mr. Disraeli for reluctance to act, since, in view of the extension of the franchise and redistribution, an immediate dissolution was impossible. Naturally he would have preferred to avoid holding office in the circumstances, but after some delay the Queen persuaded him that he should accept on the giving by Mr. Gladstone of assurances as to financial business, which the Queen quite fairly thought sufficient, though they fell short of what was asked by Lord Salisbury. In 1895 (l) the duty of Lord Salisbury to take office was perfectly clear, and he wisely did not persist in his quite untenable effort to prove that it was the duty of Lord Rosebery to dissolve if he were not willing to carry on after his defeat on the cordite issue in the Commons. A party which defeats a Government with a small majority must realise that it is bound to take office if the ministry resigns.

(i) Morley, Gladstone, ii. 623 f.

There was no doubt in 1905 (m) a stronger case for the refusal of the opposition, if it so desired, to accept office on the resignation of Mr. Balfour. There was much to be said for the view that Mr. Balfour should not resign. The King was far from satisfied with his proposal to act thus in lieu of dissolving, and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman had the issue under his consideration. Lord Ripon (n) quite fairly pointed out that it was impossible to secure that by refusal to take office Mr. Balfour would have been compelled to dissolve; the King might instead have sent for Lord Lansdowne or Mr. Chamberlain. In any case Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman adopted the sound view, that policy dictated readiness to accept the obligations of office in view of the attacks which had been directed at Mr. Balfour for clinging to it, and a most successful dissolution attested the soundness of the decision. The principle is reasonably clear. An opposition which knows that it is anxious to secure power is entitled to harass

(k) Letters, 2 s., iii. 663 f.

(m) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 189 f.

(l) Letters, 3 s., ii. 524 ff.

(n) Wolf, Ripon, ii. 273 f.

the ministry in every way, but such action is not proper, if the opposition to the ministry is aware that it cannot attempt to form a Government. In that case it must criticise with discretion.

Normally and properly the arrangements for the appointment of a new ministry should be carried out in Great Britain, and preferably in London under modern conditions of convenience of travel. One remarkable exception must be recorded, the arrangement under which Mr. Asquith had to find time to go to Biarritz in order to kiss hands. It is true that the King mentioned to him on March 4th, 1908 (o), that he would expect him to take this action, but, though Mr. Asquith's acquiescence then, and when Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman was driven by the hopeless character of his illness to resign, made him responsible for the error, it must be admitted, as Lord Esher (p) asserts, that the action was a faux pas. It was condemned on all sides contemporaneously by both political and non-political opinion, which, perhaps, did not make sufficient allowance for the failure of the King's health.

2. The Prime Minister's Formation of the Cabinet.

With the selection of the Prime Minister the essential work of the Crown is completed, for it rests with the former to make up his list of ministers and to present it for the royal assent. That assent need not be a formality, though the position of the Prime Minister in this regard is very strong. It is always open to him to assure the Crown that his list represents the terms on which it is possible for him to carry on the Government, and it is plain that the position of the King then becomes very delicate. He cannot expect to find another member of the same party willing to attempt to form a ministry; in the nature of things to look elsewhere for a Premier is out of the question. On the other hand, noblesse oblige; to force on the Crown an unsatisfactory person would run counter to the deference due to the King, and, if it were known that the ministry was pressing any appointment unduly on the sovereign, it would be resented. On the other hand, with the growing power of democracy, the sovereign will naturally accept as of course ministers, who in the Victorian epoch would have been impossible. Technically the last word rests with the King, because it is he who appoints (q).

(o) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 195.

(p) Journals, ii. 300 f.

The ministers to be included in the Cabinet are now indicated formally by the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, which enumerates (r) as entitled to a salary of £5,000 a year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretaries of State, First Lord of the Admiralty, President of the Board of Trade, Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, President of the Board of Education, Ministers of Health, Labour, and Transport, and Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence. Other ministers, who may be in the Cabinet (s), in which case they receive the same salary, are the President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the Postmaster-General, the First Commissioner of Works, whose salaries are normally £3,000, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, whose salary is derived from the funds of the Duchy (t); and there is the Minister of Pensions, whose pay is only £2,000 (u). There are also other posts to be filled by the Prime Minister with royal sanction (x). Of these the most important are the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury with £3,000 a year, and the Financial Secretary (£2,000), the Secretary for Mines and the Secretary of the Department of Overseas Trade, each with £2,000; the Foreign Office, War Office, and Admiralty are allowed each two officers, ranked as Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, the Burma, Colonial, Dominions, Home, India and Scottish Offices, the Air Ministry, Boards of Trade and of (q) Ministers are both servants of the Crown and hold office under it. Cf. Lewis v. Cattle (1938), 54 T. L. R. 721.

(r) 1 Edw. VIII. & 1 Geo. VI. c. 38, Sch. I., Pt. I., s. 1 (1) (a).

(s) Ibid. Pt. II. ss. 1 (1) (b), 3 (1), (2): the date is fixed by London Gazette notice. (t) Ibid. s. 3 (3).

(u) Ibid. s. 1 (1) (c). His inclusion in the Cabinet is not contemplated.

(x) Ibid. Sch. II., s. 1 (2) (c).

Education, and the Ministries of Agriculture and Fisheries, Health, Labour, and Transport have one apiece at £1,500, while the Assistant Postmaster-General has to be content with £1,200. To aid the Parliamentary Secretary in his duties as Chief Whip, the Act allows salaries of £1,000 for five Junior Lords of the Treasury, while, apart from this Act, of the royal household the Treasurer, the Comptroller, and the Vice-Chamberlain are political officers and salaried. There are also the Lord Chancellor and the law officers.

The essential principles of Parliamentary government demand that all officers of Cabinet rank shall be members of one or other House of Parliament. Exceptions are due only to special and temporary circumstances. Mr. Gladstone in the office of Colonial Secretary (1845—46), was without a seat (y), and Sir A. G. Boscawen, as Minister of Agriculture, was in like case in 1922—23 (z). But General Smuts' position, as member of the War Cabinet in 1917—18 without a seat in Parliament, was an anomaly excused by war conditions. In 1935 the disastrous defeat of Mr. MacDonald at Seaham must have entailed his resignation, had not an appeal to the Scottish Universities secured him reluctantly a seat, while a peerage was conferred on a minor politician to secure a seat for Mr. M. MacDonald, whose own constituents had rejected him, though less decisively. Mr. MacDonald himself in 1931 vainly endeavoured to find a seat for Sir W. Jowitt as Attorney-General, but the attempt failed, and Sir W. Jowitt had to resign, to rejoin later the Labour party, which he had deserted in the wake of his leader. [Occasionally minor offices may be held out of Parliament. The Scottish law officers should find seats there, but in 1924 and 1929 the Lord Advocate in the Labour administrations was treated as a non-political officer. In 1923, on the other hand, it was found necessary to have the Solicitor-General in the Commons, though the Lord Advocate was not in either House in Mr. Bonar's Law's ministry.]

(y) Morley, Gladstone, i. 287 f.

(z) Taylor, Brentford, p. 166: he had fought two by-elections.

The allocation of ministers as between the Houses is now in part regulated by law. The Act of 1937 allows not more than fifteen of the normal Cabinet posts (a) to be held in the Commons, and one of the four ministers with salaries of £3,000 must be in the Lords, while of those ranking as Under-Secretaries, not more than twenty may be in the Commons (b). The penalty for disregard of this rule is one not exceeding £500 a day for sitting or voting. This means in effect that there must be two Cabinet ministers of the highest rank at least (c) in the Lords, as well as the Lord Chancellor, and normally the Lord President of the Council or Lord Privy Seal, or both. But there is no limit to the number of posts held, beyond that imposed by paramount reasons of convenience. The claim has often naturally enough been made that any minister who is charged with important financial responsibilities should take his seat in the Commons, but the rule is by no means invariably followed. In the case of the Foreign Office a strong argument for presence in the Commons is afforded by the importance of the Commons keeping in close contact with the minister in charge of foreign policy, having regard to its vital importance to the national welfare. The argument has validity, and in the National Government, after its reconstitution, the office was successively held by Sir J. Simon, Sir S. Hoare, and Mr. Eden. The resignation of the latter on February 20th, 1938, was followed by the appointment to the post of Lord Halifax. The attack, however, of the Labour party on the change was met by the Prime Minister, who undertook to answer himself all questions of importance, leaving to the Under-Secretary only minor questions (d), and Sir A. Sinclair supported the appointment, on the score that (a) They total seventeen (the Secretaryships for India and Burma being held together).

(b) Act, s. 9.

(c) The old tradition was aristocratic: Lord Salisbury had ten peers, Mr. Balfour eight, in his first ministry. Mr. N. Chamberlain, in June, 1937, had six.

(d) Cf. Mr. Curzon's position as Under-Secretary (1895—98) to Lord Salisbury: Nicolson, pp. 34—40.

this procedure gave the Commons the reality of control. In the case of the Air Ministry the attack on Lord Swinton's tenure in 1937—38 was accentuated by accusations of failure to develop civil aviation. The Prime Minister countered the onslaught by the ingenious plan of adding to the Cabinet a minister without a substantive portfolio in the person of Earl Winterton, an Irish peer, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who was appointed a member of the Air Council to act as deputy thereon to the Secretary of State, and to deal in the Commons with all major questions affecting air on the service side, leaving to the Under-Secretary questions of civil aviation, which were to be his main care. But public feeling shortly compelled Lord Swinton's retirement in favour of Sir Kingsley Wood. The difficulty, of course, is that it is extremely difficult for a minister in charge of a great department to find time for serious thinking on its problems when he has the Commons to attend and questions therein to answer. But the advantage gained in this way from the presence of the minister in the Lords is lessened by his failure to keep in touch with the feeling in that House, and by the fact that a minister of the highest calibre usually desires a chance to attain the Prime Ministership, and therefore cannot be expected to go to the Lords.

Something, of course, depends on the nature of the work to be done at any moment. When finance is specially concerned, it is desirable that a department should have its head in the Commons. The War Office was placed under Lord Derby in 1916, and Lord Hailsham kept it from 1931 to 1935, but Mr. Hore-Belisha was entrusted with it in 1936, when the question arose of securing better recruiting, and it became necessary for the minister to be able to secure funds from the Treasury and spend them to the satisfaction of the Commons, while making the service much more attractive in order to secure the necessary men. The possibility of having a peer at the Admiralty was accepted, even by Mr. Gladstone, who had Lord Northbrook in 1880, Lord Ripon in 1886; and Earl Spencer in 1892; it is rendered possible by the readiness of the country to find funds for the navy.

Where the head of the department is in the Lords, there must be an officer of the rank of Parliamentary Under-Secretary in the Commons; as we have seen in the case of an important ministry like the Air Ministry, it may be necessary to have a special post to secure effective representation where controversial issues are likely to arise. On the other hand, the Upper Chamber must be content with such representation as can be given without undue inconvenience. Of late that has been far from ungenerous, while the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Officers of the Household, if peers, are available for dealing with business affecting departments without direct spokesmen in the Lords. The Paymaster-General has no actual duties; hence, if a peer is appointed, he can undertake systematically the representation of departments. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the First Commissioner of Works are not officers with much work to do, and they can easily, if peers, be of service in the Lords.

Another expedient is the appointment of ministers without portfolio. The most famous instance of this is the case of the Duke of Wellington, when, in 1841—45, he led the Lords without office, and Lord Lansdowne performed a like service for the Government of 1855—58. Lord John Russell's insistence on leading the Commons, without portfolio, in the ministry of 1852, evoked objections of various kinds (e); the point that he would thus seem to evade, the necessity of re-election, could be met by the consideration that he could accept the Chiltern Hundreds and then be re-elected, but Lord Palmerston hinted that it was a rather dangerous precedent to set the example of the tenure of high office without emoluments (f). Lord John yielded so far as to become Foreign Secretary for a few weeks, but then resigned that office and led the House without portfolio, until in June, 1854, he accepted the post of Lord President. Another anomalous case occurred in 1867, when Mr. S. Walpole remained in the Cabinet without office after resigning from the Home Office (g). The anomalous War Cabinet evoked like results. From 1915 to 1921 ten cases occurred of ministers in the Cabinet without portfolio, eight drawing salaries, their appointments being made under legislation of 1917, permitting the suspension of the rule of re-election on acceptance of office. But the system ended in 1921 after a debate in the Commons (h), which showed its unpopularity. The last minister without portfolio was Dr. Addison, who held the chairmanship of four Cabinet committees, and was member of six others, but who was not personally very popular.

(e) Letters, 1 s., ii. 421; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 71 f.

(f) Gooch, Later Corr. of Lord John Russell, ii. 119. Salaried ministers without portfolio were exempted from re-election by 9 & 10 Geo. V. c. 2, s. 2.

After a lapse of fourteen years the system was revived in Mr. Baldwin's ministry of 1935, when Lord Eustace Percy and Mr. Eden received ministries. The former found the position anomalous and unsatisfactory, and resigned office, later leaving parliamentary life. The latter was given the duty of dealing with League of Nations' affairs, his legal position being clarified by the House of Commons Disqualification (Declaration of Law) Act, 1935, but on Sir S. Hoare's retirement in December, 1935, Mr. Eden was appointed in his place, and no fresh appointment was made in lieu. The creation of the Ministry for the Co-ordination of Defence, which took place in the next year, was the addition of another ministry with a portfolio and very definite and complex functions.

The existence of ministries without substantial departmental duties, whether without portfolio or, as is normal, with one of the virtually sinecure offices, is useful mainly as a means of providing for men, whose capacity for departmental work has been lessened by passage of time, or who have no taste for administration, but whose counsel is of value, as in the case of the Duke of Wellington and Lord Lansdowne. More recent cases are those of Mr. John Bright, who proved a poor administrator at the Board of Trade in 1868, but was later valuable as Chancellor of the Duchy (i). Lord Morley, after Mr. Asquith had in 1910, in despair, accepted the latest of his constant resignations, was rescued from his unfortunate plight by the intervention of Mr. J. A. Spender (k), who found Mr. Asquith happy to give him an opportunity of useful service as Lord President. The same office has been accorded at the last period of their careers to Lord Tweedmouth (l) and Lord Wolverhampton (m) respectively. Or such a post may console a minister for whom, despite youth and capacity, no place can be found in the ordinary ranks, as in the case of Lord Eustace Percy (n). For an active (o) political leader the office would have no attraction, as affording too little scope for energy and for winning popular appreciation, while the Prime Minister might well hesitate to entrust to such a leader an office in which he might find time to organise opposition to the policies favoured by the head of the ministry. The doctrine that it is safer to have a man of independent character within, than without, the ministry, did not commend itself to Mr. Baldwin or to Mr. Chamberlain, for both refrained from the obvious policy of finding some office with or without portfolio for the restless genius of Mr. Churchill, once he had dissociated himself from Mr. Baldwin on the issue of policy regarding India.

(g) Letters, 2 s., i. 425, n. 1. He disappeared in Mr. Disraeli's ministry (i. 509).

(h) 143 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1592 ff.

(i) He resigned, July 15th, 1882, for insufficient cause: Letters, 2 s., iii. 390.

(k) Lord Oxford, i. 291 f.

(l) For his short tenure and breakdown, see Fitzroy, Memoirs, i. 351 ff.

(m) He was the first dissenter and solicitor to hold the office: Fitzroy, i. 363.

(n) Lord Curzon was Lord President from 1915—19, latterly in the War Cabinet. Lord J. Russell pointed out in 1866 that a Chancellor of the Duchy not in the Cabinet was of no use: Letters, 2 s., i. 295. In the Cabinet of 1937 the Privy Seal was given to Earl De La Warr to represent National Labour.

(o) Mr. MacDonald was Lord President in Mr. Baldwin's ministry of 1935—37.

The Law Officers of the Crown are normally not included in the Cabinet, though Sir Rufus Isaacs was accorded that honour in 1912, and Sir D. Hogg, when induced to enter Parliament, was given a Cabinet seat (1924—29). The objections to such a step are obvious enough, and the fact that the Lord Chancellor occupies an equally or more anomalous position naturally forms no defence; the objections to the exercise of judicial powers of the highest importance by a member of the Cabinet are unanswerable, even though by prudent restraint the anomaly is in practice but slightly felt. There would, of course, be no insuperable difficulty in terminating the anomaly.

The Prime Minister must, of course, in considering his list and in making new appointments, as occasion demands, consider his political position and the necessity of placating various interests. But the Cabinet has no right to be consulted as to new appointments, and Mr. Gladstone was opposed to admitting any right of that body to determine its own membership (p). But his view has not been invariably adopted; there is nothing in theory objectionable to asking the views of the Cabinet. There may be mentioned also the incident in 1851, when the Queen resented the Cabinet's desire to have Lord Clarendon as Foreign Secretary (q), and in 1866 (r), when Lord Russell, at her instance, secured the acceptance by the Cabinet of the addition of Mr. Goschen to its numbers. In 1847 and 1848 Lord John Russell consulted the Cabinet regarding the selection of Lord Clarendon as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the offer of the Admiralty to Sir J. Graham. Lord Palmerston made a rule of consultation (s), he obtained its advice in 1855 to approach the Whigs, rather than the Tories, in order to fill the posts vacated by the Peelites, and asked its approval of the replacement of Mr. Gladstone by Sir G. C. Lewis and a successor to Sir W.

(p) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 101.

(q) Letters, 1 s., ii. 345—48.

(r) Letters, 2 s., i. 294 f.

(s) Argyll, Autobiography, i. 539, 590; ii. 77.

Molesworth. Later records are few; but in 1923 Mr. Baldwin asked the Cabinet if he could add Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Birkenhead as ministers, without portfolio, in preparation for the election of 1923, but the Cabinet was not united, and so the plan was dropped (t).

Normally, of course, certain politicians must be given places if a Cabinet is to be formed at all; in Victorian days when the Upper Chamber was powerful, the leader in the Commons, if commissioned, had to take counsel with the leader in the Lords, and vice versa Sir R. Peel worked with the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lansdowne was the mentor of Lord John Russell, with whom Lord Aberdeen had to deal in his coalition of 1852—55. It is difficult to think of Mr. Gladstone or his great rival as subject to any great pressure; but Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain, in his youth, insisted on securing the latter a Cabinet seat in 1880 (u). In 1905 a very determined effort was made by Sir E. Grey and Mr. Haldane to secure Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's acceptance of a peerage, but his determined resistance renders it unlikely, that he deferred unduly to their judgment in arranging his Cabinet. His choice, for instance, of Lord Elgin for the Colonial Office, and of Lord Loreburn as Lord Chancellor in place of Mr. Haldane, was purely based on personal considerations, and his handling of the other offices conveyed disappointment, both to Mr. Bryce and Mr. Morley. In the case of a coalition, of course, the position is different. We know that the coalition of 1915 was arranged between Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law over the heads of the Liberal ministers, and that of 1916 between Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Bonar Law, the former insisting not without cause on the removal of Mr. Balfour from the Admiralty, where his placidity of outlook was inconsistent with the burning problem of protection against submarines, while his version of Jutland had cast a permanent stigma on the British navy. We have some information of the making of the Labour ministries of (t) Birkenhead, ii. 232.

(u) Letters, 2 s., iii. 88.

1924 and 1929. In 1924 Mr. MacDonald acted largely on his own authority (x). On the latter occasion Mr. MacDonald showed considerable independence, despite the necessity of taking as a nucleus Mr. Henderson, Mr. Snowden, and Mr. Thomas. The coalition of 1931 was determined by Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Baldwin, and Sir A. Sinclair, and the principles of a coalition were marked in the form as reconstructed after the withdrawal of the Liberal members, and as reconstituted by Mr. Baldwin. The reconstruction by Mr. Chamberlain still displayed this feature, and the complaints of the Liberal Nationals were hard to understand, for they owed their seats largely to Conservative votes. The National Labour members were most generously treated, in view of the fact that not one of them could claim to represent Labour in any serious sense.

It must, of course, be remembered that, while the Prime Minister has the advantage of being able to offer posts at his discretion, politicians of standing can safely decline what is given, if they command so much support in the party as to make it unwise to dispense with their services. Lord Palmerston used to demand the Foreign Office until his dismissal in 1851; thereafter he was content with other offices, but no one can doubt that even the Queen would have sanctioned his appointment to that post had he cared to press for it. As we shall see, in 1868, Lord Clarendon opposed a polite negative to the offer of anything but the Foreign Office. But Lord John Russell was the most annoying of all ministers; in 1852 he insisted as the price of his adhesion to Lord Aberdeen's ministry that he should have the leadership of the Commons without portfolio, and, though induced to accept for a time the Foreign Secretaryship, he soon demanded and obtained his own terms. There are few cases of equal persistence of recent date on record. Lord Rosebery would only serve in 1892 as Foreign Secretary and even then only after much persuasion by royalty. Other ministers, as notably in Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's Cabinet of 1905, have acquiesced in accepting ministries which they did not desire rather than be left out, and no doubt the like remark applies to the several forms of the National Government. But Mr. Lloyd George successfully demanded the Exchequer in 1908 (y).

(x) His selection of Brig.-Gen. C. B. Thomson as Air Minister is characteristic.

In selecting Under-Secretaries the Prime Minister must plainly have regard to the wishes of the head of the department. Mr. Gladstone (z) is an authority for the view that the appointment is made by the Secretary of State, as in the case of Lord Granville's appointment to the Foreign Office by Lord Palmerston, and of Mr. L. Courtney's appointment to the Home Office by Sir W. Harcourt. But the position seems to be that the Prime Minister has the patronage, though he would not give the head of a department a colleague likely to be uncongenial. It was Sir R. Peel who appointed Mr. Gladstone in 1835 to the Colonial Office (a), and Lord Palmerston who selected Lord de Grey for the War Office in 1859 (b), and it was Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman who placed Mr. Churchill under Lord Elgin, though the latter probably hardly appreciated what he was to suffer at the hands of his much too brilliant subordinate.

Of royal control of appointments instances from Queen Victoria's reign are clear. Her right to criticise was asserted by Lord Melbourne in accordance with William IV.'s practice, and it is curious to note that in 1851, when Lord Stanley was trying to form a Cabinet, she yielded only to his suggestion of Mr. Disraeli as a Secretary of State, because of the difficulties

(y) Esher, Journals, i. 303. He had first ascertained Mr. Morley's acquiescence. Morley decided to remain at the India Office, provided he was given the usual Viscountcy, which was readily conceded. He had a curious liking for honours, and found pleasure in 1910 in his precedence as President of the Council. Cf. Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 198, 292. See, for Mr. Joynson-Hicks' fate, Taylor, pp. 163 ff.

(z) Guedalla, ii. 130 f. He resented the Queen's disapproval of Mr. Courtney's transfer in 1881 to the Colonial Office. "I think this intolerable. It is by courtesy only these appointments are made known to H.M." (Ibid. 165.)

(a) Lady F. Balfour, Lord Aberdeen, ii. 19.

(b) Wolf, Ripon, i. 142.

under which Lord Stanley was working. She insisted, when asking Lord John Russell to resume power, that Lord Palmerston must not remain Foreign Secretary, but, though Lord John Russell made promises on this score, he found he dare not keep them, and Lord Palmerston ceased to hold the office in question only when his intransigence drove the Premier to remove him later in the year (c). She then successfully asserted her wish to have Lord Granville in his place, against the preference of the Cabinet for Lord Clarendon, though she permitted an offer to be made to the latter in the assurance that it would be rejected. Her dislike of Lord Palmerston as Foreign Secretary prevented Lord Derby offering him that office in 1852, when he was seeking to strengthen his position by so valuable an acquisition. Her special interest in foreign affairs expressed itself in vetoing in 1852 Mr. Bernal Osborne for the Under-Secretaryship (d); in 1861, however, she reluctantly accepted Mr. Layard (e). In 1866 she was confronted by a delicate position, for she thought Lord Stanley insufficiently qualified for the office of Foreign Secretary, but found that she could not effectively impress this opinion of his son on her Prime Minister (f). In 1868 she endeavoured to induce Mr. Gladstone to refrain from giving Lord Clarendon the Foreign Office, but though Mr. Gladstone would have deferred to her wishes if possible, the refusal of Lord Clarendon to accept any other office was decisive (g). It was only after reference to the Cabinet that the Queen accepted Mr. Goschen as member of the Cabinet while holding in 1866 the Duchy of Lancaster (h), and in 1872 the Duke of Somerset was vetoed for the Duchy (i).

The Queen's attitude in 1880 was specially drastic (k). She had been compelled to accept Mr. Gladstone, but she vetoed Mr. R. Lowe, demanded assurances that Mr. Chamberlain had

(c) Letters, 1 s., ii. 311, 314, 324 ff.

(d) Letters, 1 s., ii. 423.

(e) Letters, 1 s., iii. 444—447.

(f) Letters, 2 s., i. 353.

(g) Letters, 2 s., i. 555, 561, 564—566.

(i) Guedalla, i. 348.

(h) Letters, 2 s., i. 294 f.

(k) Letters, 2 s., iii. 71 ff., 84 ff.; Guedalla, ii. 85—91.

not made republican speeches, and a recantation of Sir C. Dilke's attacks on the civil list, as the condition of allowing him to become Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, while in 1882 she refused him the Duchy of Lancaster, and relegated him to the Local Government Board (l). She made a merit of accepting Mr. Childers at the War Office, and Lord Selborne as Lord Chancellor, while the Earl of Fife was ruled too young to be Lord Chamberlain. In 1886 (m) she refused to re-appoint Mr. Childers to the War Office, but accepted him in the Home Office, an attitude due to the dislike felt for the minister by the Duke of Cambridge; Sir C. Dilke she vetoed on the plausible ground of his appearance in a divorce case. This veto she reaffirmed in 1892 (n), and Mr. Labouchere shared the same fate. The position was rendered easier by the fact that it was possible to evade difficulties by putting the matter in the light that he would have had to sacrifice his connection with his newspaper Truth if in the ministry. More important was her refusal to accept Lord Ripon at the India Office, which went to Lord Kimberley, but she accepted the former at the Colonial Office. It was of course possible to object to an ex-Viceroy receiving the India Office. Lord Salisbury sacrificed Mr. Matthews in 1895 (o), and kept Lord Cross in 1886—92 and 1895—1900 to please her.

But the Queen's attitude was not merely one of criticism. She was quite willing to use her influence to aid in the formation of ministries, notably in the securing of Lord Rosebery for the Foreign Office in 1892, an undertaking in which she had the aid of her son (p). Of Edward VII. little is recorded; his illness at the time of the remaking of the ministry of 1902 precluded his usual activity, and in the personnel of the ministry of 1905 (q) he showed ready acquiescence, though he rejected Lord Herschell as a lord-in-waiting on the score

(l) Letters, 2 s., iii. 370 f., 378, 390. Lord Derby had to take the Colonial, not Foreign, Office (1882), and was refused the Garter: Guedalla, ii. 111, 221.

(m) Letters, 3 s., i. 28, 38, 42. Lord Salisbury asserted her right to do so: ibid. s. 2, iii. 709.

(n) Letters, 3 s., ii. 120, 150.

(p) Letters, 3 s., ii. 144 f.

(o) Letters, 3 s., ii. 529.

(q) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 444 ff.

that he was to combine the post with that of private secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The office of Lord Chamberlain was given with his assent to Lord Althorp with a viscountcy. What was striking was that he overlooked the curious blunder by which the list of the Cabinet was published in The Times on December 8th, before the King had finally approved. In the subsequent changes in 1908 (r) he seems to have been in agreement. Later information is not available in any authentic form, but George V.'s constitutional theory precludes any probability of his pressing his views on appointments (s).

To give a minister Cabinet rank is a simple procedure, since no new appointment is involved, and a mere invitation from the Prime Minister suffices (t). But, even if the minister is already sworn of the Privy Council, and so even that formality is not requisite, the Premier would doubtless inform the King of his intention to add to the Cabinet the minister in question. In 1908 the King (u) commented on the desire which Mr. Churchill was believed to have to be admitted to the Cabinet while still Under-Secretary, but demurred to such action, quoting the refusal of Lord Rosebery to accept a similar proposal when Sir E. Grey was Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office. It is significant that both agreed as to the desirability of Mr. Churchill's promotion, but the King insisted that he must wait until a Cabinet post was available. That shortly happened, though whether this particular consideration weighed with the Premier in getting rid of Lord Elgin remains to be shown.

3. The Formal Transfer of Office.

The mode in which a new Cabinet comes into existence differs according to whether the ministry falls to be formed (r) For an unnamed veto, see Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 195.

(s) Mr. MacDonald reduced to three the political posts in the royal household as a courtesy to the King. See Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 157 f.

(t) Cf. the case of Mr. Goschen in 1866: Letters, 2 s., i. 294 f.

(u) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 195.

from the same political party on the resignation of its head, or represents the displacement of one party by another.

A ministry is as much dissolved by the resignation of the Prime Minister, and that is so, whether the other members wish resignation or not. This was frankly admitted by Lord John Russell when Lord Melbourne determined to resign in 1841 (x), and Sir R. Peel insisted on it in 1846, with the result of Cabinet acquiescence (y). It is now unquestioned, and the political implications of the doctrine will be considered later. But resignation is in law not a cessation of tenure of office. A Prime Minister and his colleagues by constitutional practice remain at their posts, pending the moment when a new ministry is constituted and is prepared to take over; should the Prime Minister die in office, the rest of the ministers likewise remain in office until the new Government is constituted. Moreover, if the new Prime Minister retains ministers in their existing offices, there is no need for re-appointment. They retain their offices with tenure unaffected by the fact that the ministry has been dissolved. On the other hand, each minister holds until asked to retain his post on the understanding that he will relinquish it at the moment when he is asked to do so. If he failed, he would forthwith be dismissed by the King on the advice of the Prime Minister. It is curious that so obvious a principle should have been mistaken by Mr. Lansbury in the Commons on the change of ministry in 1935 (z), when Mr. Baldwin disposed of the issue by careful examination of the precedents of Pitt's resignation in 1761, the death of Mr. Canning and Lord Palmerston in 1827 and 1865, and the resignations of 1902, 1908, and 1923.

Naturally as short a period as possible intervenes between the resignation of the ministry and the installation of its successor; it is bad for the country that there should be any prolonged period, when ministers are precluded by obvious considerations of fairness to their successors from arriving at important decisions. Formerly longer delays have been known, as in 1839, 1845 and 1851, where after resignation ministers had to resume office, as no successors could be found, and in 1855, when it took time to find a new Government. In 1839 a very odd incident occurred. The Queen was unable to agree with Sir R. Peel's demand that the ladies of the bedchamber should be changed on political grounds. The moribund Cabinet was resuscitated to consider the issue and advised the Queen that she need not concede the point (a), with the result that Sir R. Peel refused to proceed with the formation of a ministry, and Lord Melbourne carried on for two years longer. The action was regarded by Greville as unconstitutional, but the criticism seems rather pedantic, and it was clearly a reasonable act of consideration to the young Queen. Sir R. Peel should clearly not have pressed the point, though the Queen, as she recognised later, should have been willing to concede it when he persisted in the request (b). Equally odd was the procedure in 1834, when William IV. took advantage of a suggestion of resignation by Lord Melbourne to rid himself of the ministry, for the Duke of Wellington in the interval, while Sir R. Peel was returning from Rome, accepted office as First Lord of the Treasury and Secretary of State, a procedure which in fact was due to the eagerness of the King to rid himself of ministers whom he had not treated too well (c).

(x) Letters, 1 s., i. 301.

(y) Letters, 1 s., ii. 80; Gladstone, Gleanings, i. 243.

(z) 304 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 337 ff.

The actual formal transfer takes place as regards the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Secretaries of State and other ministers having seals, by the handing over of their seals of office (d) to the King, who hands them to their

(a) Letters, 1 s., i. 171; Parker, Peel, ii. 392; Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, i. 207 ff.

(b) Letters, 1 s., i. 167, n. 2.

(c) Melbourne Papers, pp. 220 ff.

(d) On the procedure in the case of those without seals, see Letters, 2 s., iii. 679. When the new Secretaryship for Air was created, Walter Long lent his seals: Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 668.

successors. In the case of the Lords of the Treasury, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the Postmaster-General fresh letters patent are issued, revoking the earlier appointments. It is now the rule that two Councils are held on the same day, the retiring ministers being received by the King and handing over their seals, while at the second the seals are given to ministers, and the King declares the Lord President and the First Commissioner of Works.

4. The Cabinets from William IV.

In 1827, the resignation through ill health of Lord Liverpool terminated a ministry which had lasted since June, 1812. In April, Canning took office with a coalition, but only to die in August, when Lord Goderich maintained a coalition government whose internal dissensions led to his retirement and the advent of a Tory government under the Duke of Wellington in January, 1828. In July, 1830, the demise of the Crown necessitated a general election, but in November, the ministry, defeated on the civil list, resigned rather than face the problem of reform.

1. Earl Grey who now took office in order to carry reform dissolved on that score in April, 1831, and secured the necessary mandate for the passage of the Reform Bill. In December, Parliament was again dissolved, in order to allow the new electorate to vote; it had been increased from 435,391 to 652,777, and the election gave reformers 487, Conservatives 171 seats. But owing to internal dissensions, the Premier resigned in July, 1834, making way for Lord Melbourne.

2. Lord Melbourne had only a brief tenure of office. He resigned in November in consequence of certain difficulties with the more than ready acquiescence of the King, and was succeeded by Sir R. Peel.

3. Sir R. Peel secured a dissolution, but the results in January, 1835, gave the Tories only 293 as against 365 seats, thus strengthening them greatly but not so as to be able to maintain office. In April, the ministry resigned on defeat on the issue of the revenues of the Irish Church.

4. Lord Melbourne's new ministry held office, mainly through royal favour until August, 1841. The dissolution of 1837 on the demise of the Crown left it with no more than 339 to 319 seats, and May, 1839, saw it driven, by the disappearance of its majority on the issue of the coercion of Jamaica as regards slavery, to resignation (e). Sir R. Peel undertook to form a government, but the opposition of the Queen on the issue of parting with certain ladies of the bedchamber (f) led to his giving up his commission, and Lord Melbourne resumed his precarious tenure of office. In June, 1841, he was defeated on a definite issue of no confidence and against his own judgment dissolved. The voting gave him only 289 to 269 seats, and he resigned in August after defeat in the Commons.

5. Sir R. Peel held office until 1845, when he resigned in December in view of difficulties on the issue of free trade (g). Lord John Russell, however, failed to form a ministry, for Earl Grey would not accept office if he was to have Lord Palmerston as a colleague in the post of Foreign Secretary, and Sir R. Peel had to resume his post. He succeeded in passing the legislation repealing the corn laws, but only at the cost of deeply splitting his party, with a result that he was defeated and resigned in June, 1846, on an Irish Coercion Bill.

6. Lord John Russell took office in July, 1846, but the general election of 1847 failed to give him a clear majority; though all figures for this period are disputed, he seems to have had about 325 Whig and Liberal votes as against 226 Tories and 105 Peelites; a more favourable view gives him 337 seats, Protectionists 202, and Peelites 116. The position was difficult, and in February, 1851 (h), the ministry was defeated on a franchise motion and resigned. The leader of the Protectionists, Lord Stanley, was most reluctant to take office, and, after prolonged negotiations which failed to clarify the situation in any essentials, Lord John Russell had to resume office. Owing to his quarrel with Lord Palmerston, whom he removed from the government in December, he was defeated on the Militia Bill and resigned in February, 1852.

(e) Letters, I s., i. 141, 153, 176; Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, i. 199 ff.

(f) Letters, I s., i. 158—173; Parker, Peel, ii. 387 ff.; Greville, i. 201 ff.

(g) Letters, I s., ii. 48—67; Parker, iii. 229 ff., 283 ff.; Greville, ii. 317—332.

7. Lord Derby had clearly a most difficult task, and his dissolution in July, 1852, brought him no sufficient support. It is calculated that (i) some 300 Conservatives were returned 270 Whigs and Liberals, 40 Peelites and 40 members of the Irish party. Defeated in December by 19 votes on Mr Disraeli's budget, the ministry resigned.

8. Then followed the coalition of Whigs, Liberals or Radicals, and Peelites under Lord Aberdeen with Lord John Russell to lead the Commons (k). The resignation of the latter in January, 1855, on Mr. Roebuck's proposed motion for a committee on the Crimean War, so weakened the ministry that, though it was induced by the Queen not to resign forthwith, it succumbed to the motion and then resigned. Much confused searching for a successor followed, but the inevitable result was the appearance in power in February of Lord Palmerston (l).

9. Lord Palmerston, however, lost almost at once his Peelite colleagues on his acceptance of the Roebuck motion, and thus the ministry assumed a predominantly Liberal appearance. In March, 1857, Conservatives, Peelites, Radicals, acting for very differing motives, defeated him on the issue of his policy in China, but the following dissolution gave him

(h) Letters, 1 s., ii. 288—315; Monypenny and Buckle, Disraeli, i. 1101 ff.; Walpole, Russell, ii. 123 ff.; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 40 ff.; Greville, iii. 377 ff.

(i) Cf. Lord Derby's figures, December 18th, 1852 (Letters, 1 s., ii. 413): 286 Conservatives, 150 Radicals, 120 Whigs, 50 Irish Brigade, 30 Peelites.

(k) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 70 ff.; Lady F. Balfour, Aberdeen, ii. 171—177.

(l) Bell, ii. 110 ff.; Balfour, ii. 288—298; Monypenny and Buckle, i. 1372 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, i. 521 ff.

373 seats to 281. But in February, 1858, his seeming submission to French threats on the Conspiracy to Murder Bill caused his defeat by the Conservatives, Peelites, Lord John Russell, Sir James Graham, Mr. Gladstone and Radicals (m). He insisted on resignation, and the Queen sent for Lord Derby, who, after his failure to form ministries in 1851 and 1855, had no option but to undertake to form a government when the Queen pressed him so to do.

10. The Derby ministry survived a severe attack on its unfortunate error committed by Lord Ellenborough (n) in censuring the conduct of Lord Canning as regards Oudh by the use of the threat of dissolution, which the Queen had reluctantly permitted it to employ, but in March, 1859, it was defeated on reform. The dissolution of April gave a Liberal majority of about 347 to 307, and in June the ministry was defeated on an amendment to the address in reply to the royal speech and resigned.

11. Lord Palmerston took office (o) after Lord Granville had made a fruitless attempt at the request of the Queen to form a ministry in which Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell would serve under him; the former agreed, the latter declined, but was willing to serve under Palmerston, who thus became Premier. He dissolved in July, 1865, winning 360 to 298 seats, but died in October.

12. Lord Russell naturally took his place (p), but in June was defeated on his Reform Bill by the defection of Mr. Lowe and others, and resigned.

13. Lord Derby (q) took office, as the ministry declined to continue despite the Queen's wish, and Mr. Disraeli's ability "dished the Whigs" and carried a Reform Bill, which increased the electorate from 1,056,659 in 1866 to 1,995,086 in 1869.

(m) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 181 ff.; Letters, 1 s., iii. 265, 267—272; Monypenny and Buckle, i. 1513 ff.; Morley, i. 574 ff.

(n) Bell, ii. 187 ff.

(o) Bell, ii. 202 ff.; Letters, 1 s., iii. 342, 344—349; Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 324 ff.

(p) Morley, ii. 157 ff.; Letters, 2 s., i. 279 ff.

(q) Letters, 2 s., i. 333 ff.; Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 173 ff.

In February, 1868, he resigned from ill health and advised the Queen to send for his obvious successor, Mr. Disraeli (r).

14. Mr. Disraeli in April, 1868, was defeated on the issue of the Irish Church, but did not resign (s), expediting instead preparations for a new register of voters, and in November, Parliament was dissolved, giving Liberals 380 to 278 seats.

15. Mr. Gladstone's first ministry took office in December, 1868 (t), and resigned in March, 1873, when defeated on the Irish University Bill. But Mr. Disraeli would not take office (u) and it had to resume, dissolving in January, 1874. The Liberals won 249 seats, Home Rule supporters 51, but Conservatives 352, and the ministry resigned in February without meeting Parliament, as Mr. Disraeli had done in 1868.

16. Mr. Disraeli's ministry (x) dissolved in March, 1880, under the impression that events were favourable, but as a result of its unpopularity on foreign issues the election gave Liberals 350, Home Rulers 64, and Conservatives only 238. The ministry resigned in April.

17. Mr. Gladstone took office (y) after a futile attempt to obtain a ministry under Lord Hartington. It passed a Reform Act in 1884 under which the electorate grew from 2,618,453 in 1883, to 4,380,540 in 1885. But it was defeated on the budget in June, 1885, and as pending redistribution which was in progress and increased the House to 670 (England 495, Scotland 72, Ireland 103) a dissolution was impossible, it resigned.

18. After receiving some assurances as to aid in financial business from Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury took office (z) and dissolved in November. The election gave Liberals 335, (r) Letters, 2 s., i. 495 ff.; Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 316 ff.

(s) Letters, 2 s., i. 521 ff.; Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 366; Morley, ii. 247 f.

(t) Letters, 2 s., i. 559 ff.; Morley, ii. 249 ff.

(u) Guedalla, i. 385—410; Morley, ii. 446 ff.; Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 546 ff.

(x) Letters, 2 s., ii. 315; Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 621 ff.

(y) Letters, 2 s., iii. 73 ff.; Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 1396 ff.; Morley, ii. 616 ff.; Garvin, Chamberlain, i. 285 ff.

(z) Letters, 2 s., iii. 657 ff.; Churchill, Randolph Churchill, i. 397 ff.; Morley, iii. 200 ff.

Nationalists 86, and Conservatives 249, a number secured by the aid of the Nationalist voters in boroughs given under the belief that the Conservatives would make concessions on Home Rule. The ministry met the Commons in January, 1886, but was defeated on an amendment to the address, and resigned.

19. Mr. Gladstone took office in February, 1886 (a), but in June was defeated on the issue of Home Rule. The dissolution which followed was disastrous to him, giving Conservatives 316, Liberal Unionists 78, Liberals 191, supporters of Parnell 78 (85), and he resigned in July.

20. Lord Salisbury assumed office (b), failing to form a coalition with the Liberal Unionists although he was willing to serve under Lord Hartington, and on the resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill was strengthened by securing Mr. Goschen as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The ministry was able to hold its own, but the dissolution of June, 1892, gave Conservatives 268, Liberal Unionists 47, Liberals 274, and Nationalists 81. The ministry waited for defeat in the Commons on a vote of no-confidence in August.

21. Mr. Gladstone took office (c), faced by an impossible task of carrying Home Rule with a quite inadequate majority, and in March, 1894, the failure of his colleagues to support him in economy on defence resulted in his resignation.

22. The Queen then chose Lord Rosebery (d) whose unhappy tenure of office ended in June, 1895, when a snap vote on cordite supplies was eagerly welcomed as an excuse for resignation, the Premier declining to dissolve as desired by Lord Salisbury, on the ground that the same Commons had defeated him in August, 1892.

(a) Letters, 2 s., iii. 706 ff.; 3 s., i. 5 ff.; Lady G. Cecil, Salisbury, iii. 272 ff.; Morley, iii. 277; Churchill, ii. 1 ff.

(b) Letters, 3 s., i. 161 ff.; Cecil, iii. 307 ff.; Churchill, ii. 116 ff. For Gladstone's comments on Lord Hartington's position, see Morley, iii. 364 ff.

(c) Letters, 3 s., ii. 103; Morley, iii. 490 ff.

(d) Letters, 3 s., ii. 364 ff.; Morley, iii. 507 ff.; Crewe, Rosebery, ii. 437 ff.; Gardiner, Harcourt, ii. 258 ff.

23. Lord Salisbury then took office (e), and dissolved Parliament in July, winning 340 seats, with Liberal Unionists 71, as against Liberals 177 and Nationalists 82. A dissolution cleverly planned on the strength of a supposed cessation of war in South Africa in September, 1900, gave Conservatives 334, Liberal Unionists 68, Liberals 186, and Nationalists 82. In July, 1902, Lord Salisbury suddenly resigned in obscure circumstances.

24. Mr. Balfour was his inevitable successor (f), as Leader of the Commons throughout his ministry. His term was troubled by the dispute on protection, which led to resignations of great importance in 1903, but he held to office until December, 1905, when the Cabinet finally agreed to resign without meeting Parliament.

25. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman took office (g), and the election of January, 1906, gave Liberals 377, Labour 43, Nationalists 83, and Conservatives with whom the Liberal Unionists had in effect merged since 1895 only 167. He resigned in April, 1908, owing to ill-health.

26. Mr. Asquith, his inevitable successor (h), had to continue the attack on the Lords. The rejection of the Finance Bill of 1909 necessitated an election in January, 1910, which gave Liberals 275; Labour 40, Nationalists 82, and Conservatives 273. The issue over the Parliament Bill and the creation of peers necessitated an election in December, which gave Liberals and Conservatives 272 each, Labour 42, and Nationalists 84. In May, 1915, opposition criticism compelled a coalition.

27. The coalition lasted only until December, 1916, when it was converted into a new coalition with a War Cabinet (i).

(e) Letters, 3 s., ii. 321 ff.; Holland, Devonshire, ii. 216 ff.

(f) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 158 ff.; Holland, ii. 279 f.

(g) Spender, Campbell-Bannerman, ii. 188 ff.; Lee, ii. 441 ff.

(h) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 194 ff.; Lee, ii. 578 ff.

(i) For 1915, see Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 164 ff.; Beaverbrook, Politicians and the War, i. 90 ff.

28. The Government of Mr. Lloyd George (k) dissolved in November, 1918, when the wholesale concession of the franchise to men at age twenty-one and women at age thirty had added thirteen million new voters to the eight million already existing. The election, fought on an appeal to support the man who won the war, gave the coalition 526 seats, Labour 63, Liberals 33, Irish 80, and Independents 5, the total seats having on redistribution been increased to 707 (England 528, Scotland 74, Ireland 105), as opposed to 670 in 1885, and 658 earlier. Owing to internal dissensions Mr. Lloyd George resigned in October.

29. Mr. Bonar Law took office (l) and dissolved at once, winning 347 seats to Labour 142, and Liberals 114. In May, 1923, he resigned owing to ill-health.

30. His successor, Mr. Baldwin (m), dissolved again in November in order to secure a mandate for protection, but the Conservatives won only 258 seats to Labour 191, and Liberals 159. He met Parliament in January, 1924, but was defeated on a vote of no-confidence, and resigned.

31. The Labour ministry of Mr. MacDonald (n) held on only until October, when it chose a defeat on a minor issue as a ground of dissolving. It was decisively defeated, in part as a result of the incident of the Zinovieff letter, and resigned; the figures were Conservatives 420, Labour 151, and Liberals only 40, though 18 per cent. of the recorded votes went to them. The instinct for the two-party system thus manifested itself decisively.

32. Mr. Baldwin's Conservative ministry (o) held office from November, 1924, to June, 1929, when he resigned as the result of the election just preceding, which gave Conservatives about 260 seats, Labour 287, and Liberals 59.

(k) Spender, ii. 248 ff.; Beaverbrook, ii. 208 ff.; Lloyd George, War Memoirs, ii. 997 ff.

(l) Ronaldshay, Curzon, iii. 809 ff.; Taylor, Bonar Law, pp. 257 ff.; Mallet, Cave, pp. 253 ff.

(m) Ronaldshay, iii. 349 ff.

(n) Snowden, Autobiography, ii. 589 ff.

(o) Spender, ii. 394 ff.; Mallet, pp. 270 ff.

33. The Labour ministry (p) held office until August, 1931, when it fell through the defection of Mr. MacDonald, who was invited to form a National Government, and succeeded with Conservative and Liberal aid in doing so, on the ground that the national financial emergency dictated the dropping of party recrimination. The equalisation of women with men as to the franchise in 1928 had added five million to the electorate, and the effect was visible in the election which the ministry in October decided to hold to secure a mandate for reforms of unspecified character, to be determined upon after full investigation. The result gave Conservatives 471, Labour 52, Liberal Nationals 35, Liberals 33, National Labour 13, and Independents 9, with two Irish Nationalists. The total seats had fallen, after the separation of the Irish Free State, to 615.

34. The election over, the Government was reconstituted into a full Cabinet, representing the Conservatives, Liberals, and National Labour, the previous Government having been merely an emergency ministry to meet the immediate situation. The Liberals proper in the new ministry went out of the Government on September 28th, 1932, when the acceptance of the Ottawa Conference agreements ended any possibility of a return to freedom of trade, but the ministry was only dissolved by the resignation of Mr. MacDonald, who had long been without importance as compared with Mr. Baldwin, in June, 1935.

35. The virtually Conservative ministry of Mr. Baldwin lasted until his resignation in May, 1937, which was justified by his feeling that at his age rest would be welcome. It was marked by the dissolution of November, 1935, which gave Conservatives 387, Liberal Nationals 33, mainly elected by Conservative votes, National Labour 8, dependent on Conservative votes, with two Nationals and one Independent; the parties in opposition were Labour 154, Independent Labour party 4, Liberals and Independent Liberals 21, Independents 4, and a solitary Communist. As in the election of 1931, the allocation of seats was very much out of proportion to the votes cast.

36. In May, 1937, Mr. N. Chamberlain became head of a ministry which, as the figures of the election of 1935 show, depends essentially on Conservative votes; there is essentially no distinction between the Conservative members and others, and the organisations of the latter are without substantial backing, and no doubt will disappear as soon as their futility is fully appreciated.

CHAPTER III.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND HIS COLLEAGUES.

1. The Status of the Prime Minister.

IT is a commonplace that Sir R. Peel was the model Prime Minister. It is claimed, and seemingly with truth, that he supervised and was genuinely familiar with the business of each department (a). He himself, though his Chancellor of the Exchequer was able, introduced his budgets in 1842 and 1845. The War Office, the Admiralty, the Foreign Office, the administration of India and of Ireland felt his personal influence as much as the Treasury or the Board of Trade. Sir R. Peel (b) frankly claimed the duty to deal with these departments, and added that of exercising the then wide and unrestricted royal patronage, the whole of the communications with the sovereign, correspondence with persons of station on public business, the reception of deputations, and attendance for six or seven hours a day for five or six days a week when Parliament was sitting. It is plain that the days are gone when such a comprehensive view of the duties of a Prime Minister could be made actual; Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Disraeli in their best days could emulate without attaining his achievement; the extension of state functions to-day would render even their degree of control impossible; were the Prime Minister to undertake it, the result would no doubt be equally disastrous to him and to the country. Moreover, Sir R. Peel had the good fortune not to be troubled by subordinates of capacity comparable with his own; Sir J.

(a) Rosebery, Miscellanies, i. 197; cf. Morley, Gladstone, i. 248.

(b) Report of Select Committee on Official Salaries (1850), pp. 40 f.

Graham and Mr. Goulburn are dim shadows at the present day.

Needless to say, Lord Melbourne's essential love of peace precluded any effort to engross authority, and Lord John Russell's wayward and undependable spirit was unequal even to the problem of dealing with Lord Palmerston. The latter had definitely limited interests, and had no desire whatever to enforce the practice under Sir R. Peel by which measures were brought before him by all departments before consideration, in the form determined by him, by the Cabinet; hence the famous episode of 1860 when the Prime Minister did not conceal his indifference to the destruction by the Lords of Mr. Gladstone's Paper Duties Bill (c).

There is abundant evidence that Mr. Disraeli did not care to adopt the rôle of controller of departmental affairs. His policy was to appoint a man he trusted to the headship of a department, and then to support him as long as he trusted him, even against criticism from the rest of the Cabinet. Thus he allowed Lord Carnarvon to annex the Transvaal without even the knowledge of the Cabinet, refused against his own better judgment to recall Sir Bartle Frere from South Africa in deference to the wishes of the Queen and Sir M. Hicks Beach (d), and determined on the route for the Afghan campaign at the motion of Lord Cranbrook against the wishes of a majority of the Cabinet. Lord Salisbury's criticism (e) of this attitude is clear but not convincing, and it certainly cannot be said that the Prime Minister was willing to support a colleague against the Cabinet in the department in which, as was inevitable, he took special interest; he forced his foreign policy on the Cabinet despite the resistance of Lord Derby and his resignation (f). The impression left is that the Premier preferred individual to Cabinet rule, and that was

(c) Letters, 1 s., iii. 401; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 259 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 31—40, 238 f.

(d) Lady V. Hicks Beach, Hicks Beach, i. 130.

(e) Balfour, Autobiography, pp. 113 ff.

(f) Letters, 2 s., ii. 583 f., 609, 611.

natural in view of his close relations with the Queen who looked to him to give effect to the policy on which they agreed, no doubt usually on his initiative. It would have been embarrassing to allow Cabinet intervention, and Lord Carnarvon bears testimony to the clever use made by the Premier of the royal authority to force through his foreign policy even by a hint of resignation of the throne (g). This attitude was the more possible because Mr. Disraeli had no desire to promote legislation on social reform of a wide character which would have demanded combined consideration by the Cabinet; he remained in essentials content to deal with administration.

Of Lord Salisbury's attitude, we have sufficient evidence both from Lady G. Cecil (h) and from Sir M. Hicks Beach (i), a candid critic. He was engrossed in foreign affairs, his one real interest, and insisted on holding that office when Prime Minister up to 1900. Moreover, he was destitute of the desire or knowledge necessary to enable him to delegate authority to his subordinates in the Foreign Office. His love of working at home rendered him little more than a stranger in his own department, and his mode of work left him without the necessary time to attempt any supervision of other departments. He was content, therefore, to allow his ministers to work out their own problems, and to accept majority decisions of the Cabinet even against his own judgment, contrasting therein strongly with Mr. Disraeli's preference for his own judgment, based on that of a trusted subordinate or backed by the authority of the Queen.

The authority exerted by Mr. Gladstone in the ministry of 1868—74 was doubtless wide and far-reaching (k), though he made no effort to control departmental business in the manner of Sir R. Peel. But he introduced a new element unknown to Mr. Disraeli or Lord Salisbury, belief in the duty of a ministry to press forward large measures of reform, such as (g) Gladstone, After Thirty Years, p. 141.

(i) Hicks Beach, ii. 360 f.

(h) Salisbury, iii. 167 ff.
(k) Guedalla, i. 46 ff.

the disestablishment of the Irish Church, or, later, electoral reform and the grant of self-government to Ireland. In the ministry of 1880—85 (l) he had a new rôle to play in mediating between the Whigs and the Radicals, whose control by the restless ambition and genuine conviction of Mr. J. Chamberlain led to the growing discomfort of the Whigs, and prepared the way for their desertion in 1886 of the Liberal cause, in conjunction, curiously enough, with the minister whose advanced social views had caused them so much anxiety, and had entailed the conciliatory intervention of the Premier to keep the peace. Even when in 1892 a slight majority restored the Liberals to office rather than power, the leader had differences of importance to face. There had developed a spirit of Imperialism which was rather foreign to his nature, and this difference of outlook was fated to grow until it accelerated his departure from office, and presented his successor with a hopeless effort to preserve some semblance of unity when his own imperialism was contrasted sharply with the sentiments of the leader of the House of Commons. There could be no idea of effective control of his Cabinet by Lord Rosebery.

Mr. Balfour's tenure of office has been variously judged (m). It is clear that his tactics completely failed to preserve unity as between the supporters of tariff reform and free trade, and the circumstances of the departure of the free trade ministers from office are not wholly creditable. His new ministers were much inferior to him in capacity and were doubtless glad to be guided by his experience. But the view that he was the ablest Prime Minister of the present century, whether Mr. Lloyd George be excepted or not, seems impossible to defend. His management of the parliamentary position, so as to remain in office without an effective programme was justly censured by the overwhelming defeat, which was meted out to the ministry in 1906. His intellectual talent was doubtless superior to that of any other Premier of the century, but the Conservative party was doubtless wise in ridding itself of his leadership in 1911 (n), and in never restoring him to that position.

(l) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 2 ff.

(m) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 159 f., 173—191. Cf. Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, i. 333 ff.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman (o) became Prime Minister suffering from health already impaired and full of domestic anxiety over the growing illness of his wife. He had also under him a Cabinet composed of men of divergent views, for the divergence of view between supporters of Imperialism and opponents was far from dead, and the ministry was deeply engaged in efforts to carry legislation against the solid opposition of the House of Lords. In these circumstances he could intervene only in issues of first class importance, but it was to him that the grant of responsible Government to the conquered Boer colonies was due in 1906—07. Mr. Asquith (p) had no easy task with Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Churchill, eager to press social legislation at the expense of defence preparations, but his good natured and easy going treatment of the ministry was not unsuccessful. His defects, such as they were, appeared during the war years, and especially after the coalition forced upon him in 1915. The Cabinet with its disparate elements required careful control and guidance, and, making all allowances for unfair criticism (q) instigated by friends of Mr. Lloyd George or of Mr. Bonar Law, it must be recognised that he failed in the crisis to impose leadership in adequate measure. It was very different with his successor. Mr. Lloyd George's creation of the War Cabinet left the Prime Minister in an unique position of authority, for Mr. Bonar Law, who alone was in a position to oppose him with authority, was convinced alike of his sincerity and capacity to win the war, and lent him invaluable and self (n) Dugdale, ii. 81—92; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 370 ff.

(o) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 441—470.

(p) Cf. his Fifty Years of Parliament, ii. 186.

(q) Beaverbrook, Politicians and the War (1928—32).

effacing aid (r). If we may judge from his own record, his control must have been secured by his remarkable capacity to see with the utmost clarity the strong points of any argument which appealed to him, and to expound it, coupled with his not less characteristic ability to minimise, or wholly to ignore, important considerations telling against his point of view. It is the leading feature of his defence of his attitude in the long feud with Sir W. Robertson (s) and Lord Haig that he ignores entirely in his polemic the real points of the case against him, and instead presents the views of his opponents in such a manner as to render them incapable of sustaining the onslaught directed against them. It is easy to understand how completely he could carry with him a Cabinet when arguments so plausible were presented with all his genuine force of persuasion, for it is not to be supposed that the Premier was conscious in the least that he had failed to present to himself the real case on the opposing side. In estimating the measure of his success as director of the war, it must be remembered that, fortunately no doubt for the nation, his favourite scheme of seeking to win the war anywhere, except on the western front, was never carried into force, and that victory was at last achieved in large measure by the steadfast character and genuine military capacity of the general whom he would have gladly removed from office (t), but luckily dared not dismiss, and who himself held that he was bound to remain so long as he believed that he could achieve success (u). It is unfortunate for Lord Haig that he lacked all dialectical power, but the solidity of his position, as indeed of that of Sir W. Robertson, stands out conclusively in the records.

In one respect Mr. Lloyd George undoubtedly went far beyond the duties of a Prime Minister, and it was his constant intervention in foreign affairs which earned him, not unjustly, (r) H. A. Taylor, Andrew Bonar Law, pp. 225—236.

(s) Soldiers and Statesmen: Duff Cooper, Haig.

(t) War Memoirs, iv. 2267 ff.

(u) Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 17 ff.

the dislike of Lord Curzon, and induced the latter to rally to the side of Mr. Bonar Law, and thus to assure the destruction of the coalition ministry in 1922. There is no doubt whatever of Mr. George's unfairness on this head. To create a rival secretariat in the Cabinet Office, to decide issues of the highest importance behind the back of the Foreign Secretary, to receive Ambassadors without the presence of the minister, and even without prior notification were inexcusable acts (x). It is true that Lord Curzon showed both lack of self respect and of his duty to the country in acquiescing in such a position, but he no doubt consoled himself with the feeling that he could still do good service to his country, which later proved true, above all by his very genuine feat in regard to the negotiation of peace with Turkey (y). No doubt Mr. Lloyd George never succeeded in realising the essential change brought about by the advent of peace, and the necessity of restoring the old practices of Cabinet government. He delayed as long as he dared the restoration of the normal Cabinet, and he actually seems to have thought it possible that Mr. A. Chamberlain would accept office as Chancellor of the Exchequer without a seat in the Cabinet (z). When this idea was rejected with firmness, all that he would concede was a place in the Cabinet, but the restoration of the full Cabinet was further delayed, without, it seems clear, any public advantage (a).

Mr. Bonar Law was from the first so unwell that it was not to be expected that he would seek to maintain the authority of his predecessor, nor had he any desire to do so. Far from being anxious to retain the expanded office, which furnished his predecessor with ammunition and enabled him to intervene in administration, he contemplated even its abolition, and through his initiative it was reduced to normal and proper functions. Mr. MacDonald, like Lord Salisbury, in 1924, conceived it to be his duty to take the Foreign Office, and (x) Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 23, 56 ff.

(z) Down the Years, pp. 139 f.

(y) See Nicolson, pp. 281 ff.
(a) See p. 54, ante.

thus at once by reason of the complexity of the work disabled himself, even if he had desired it, from interference in the administration of other departments. In the ministry of 1929, though the error of 1924 was not repeated, his interest in foreign affairs, and his desire to control Mr. Henderson as Foreign Secretary, was no doubt one of the causes of that estrangement between the two men which was so marked when, in 1931, Mr. MacDonald deserted his party, and, in the view of the overwhelming mass of his followers, abandoned his principles for the sake of office and the applause of the upper circles of society which he loved to frequent (b).

Mr. Baldwin's ministries appear to reveal him as essentially a good Cabinet man, unwilling to intervene in the business of his colleagues, save to such extent as issues were inevitably brought before the Cabinet. His tendency to trust his colleagues was marked most conspicuously in the acceptance by him and his Cabinet of the accord with M. Laval arrived at hastily and without proper consideration by Sir S. Hoare on a hurried visit to Paris in December, 1935. It must have been patent on any serious consideration that the plan of action proposed, under which the Negus would have been advised to make concessions to Italy, which must have formed a mere prelude to the complete control of that power over his dominions, was a definite breach of duty under the Covenant of the League. Its hasty repudiation under stress of public feeling showed Mr. Baldwin's sensitiveness to the will of the people, but the mischief had been done and could not be cured by Sir S. Hoare's retirement to save the face of the government. Subsequently, Mr. Baldwin found a safer minister in Mr. Eden, but the advent of Mr. N. Chamberlain, bent on an accord with Italy at the expense of Ethiopia, led hastily to the disappearance from the scene of the Foreign Secretary (c), and his replacement by Lord Halifax, whose accomplishments can hardly compensate for the fact that nothing but the great skill of Lord Willingdon restored British authority in India from the depressed condition into which it had fallen under the well-meaning but feeble and vacillating direction of his predecessor.

(b) Mr. MacDonald could properly have resigned office, leaving Mr. Baldwin to act.

(c) February 20th, 1938. The issue was debated on February 21st and 22nd.

Against these signs of the paramount importance of the Prime Minister there is little to set. The best known case of a Premier being overruled by a Cabinet majority on an issue of importance is that of Mr. Bonar Law on Mr. Baldwin's debt settlement with the United States (d). Failing health, no doubt, explains why the Premier, convinced as he rightly was, of the folly of a settlement on terms so onerous and so certain to be of grave disadvantage to European appeasement, determined to remain in office instead of throwing on Mr. Baldwin the onus of an action whose evil results will be stressed more and more as the disastrous effect of the pressure on Germany which it necessitated becomes recognised by history.

It is clear, therefore, that the polite description of the Prime Minister as primus inter pares, which satisfied Lord Morley (e), or the higher claim of Sir W. Harcourt (f) that he should rank as stellas inter luna minores is inadequate to describe the real position of the Prime Minister if by temperament he is willing to assert to the full the position which he can assert if he so desires (g). The power of the Prime Minister grows, not diminishes, and this is inevitable when the sources whence it is derived are borne in mind. The root of the matter lies in the fact that since the Reform Act of 1832, the Prime Minister has become the choice of the electorate, and a general election is fought largely on personalities rather than on principles. The reason for this lies in the fact that democracies find it easier and wiser to form judgments on men rather than on doctrines. They feel, after a man has been before them in high office, that they can trust him or not to further the kind of views which will appeal to them, even when applied in novel settings. The Tamworth manifesto of 1834 in which Sir R. Peel appealed to the electors to support him in office which had been conferred on him by William IV., marks the beginning of the new epoch, and it was made absolutely clear by the election of 1857, when the issue was certainly nothing more or less than whether Lord Palmerston should be in power or not (h). In 1859, the contest was between Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli in office and Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell outside ; in 1865, Lord Palmerston's personality alone counted (i). Later the electors voted for Mr. Disraeli or Mr. Gladstone, and the addresses of these politicians to the electors in their own constituencies became palpably appeals to the nation. Mr. Disraeli realised this in 1868 no less than Mr. Gladstone in 1874, when he secured Cabinet approval for his chief projects and referred as a justification to Sir R. Peel's precedent. A further step was due to Mr. Gladstone himself, when no longer in name, though in reality, leader of the Liberal party. His famous Midlothian campaign in 1879 (k) against the policy of the government was successful in destroying the ministry, and the opposition leaders were not slow to follow suit, even Lord Salisbury condescending to speak at public gatherings outside his constituency, a fact of which Mr. Gladstone reminded his sovereign when, in 1886, she called his attention to his allocutions to enthusiasts at such informal places as railway stations (l).

(d) Taylor, Bonar Law, pp. 270—272.

(e) Morley, Walpole, p. 157.

(g) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 41 ff.

Royal remonstrances, of course, could not stay an inevitable process. The election of 1892 was carried for Mr. Gladstone by his personal appeal to many voters (m) whose interest in Home Rule was negligible, a fact which helps to explain why in 1895 there was for once the amazing spectacle of accord

(h) Morley, Gladstone, i. 584.

(i) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 414 ff.

(k) Speeches in Scotland, vol. i.; Guedalla, ii. 16—20.

(l) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 344.

(m) Mr. Goschen quite correctly, in 1895, attributed the Liberal débâcle largely to the fact that it was not a Gladstonian election: Letters, 3 s., ii. 541 f.

between Lord Rosebery and Sir W. Harcourt that the ministry should resign on the adverse vote on the cordite supply, and not ask for a fresh vote of confidence from the electorate. The resounding Liberal victory of 1906 was much influenced by the loss of faith in Mr. Balfour engendered by the shifts and tactics of the years 1903—05, which placed him in an unfavourable light when contrasted with the simple down-rightness of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, whose vast fund of acumen was little realised outside his immediate circle. It was in part the failure of Mr. Asquith in personal magnetism which left him with so poor a majority in 1910 as compared with that of 1905; respect for his substantial talents aroused none of the enthusiastic loyalty which assured Mr. Gladstone of strong support in Scotland. On the other hand, Mr. Lloyd George succeeded in conveying to the electors a firm belief in his role of victor in the World War; the vast majority of 1918 was a personal triumph. It took long for Mr. Baldwin to establish anything like a personal hold; the famous slogan of "Safety First" definitely depressed his chances in 1929, and it was only six years later that his personality counted very definitely in the election of 1935. It may be noted also that the Labour and Liberal parties at that contest suffered gravely from lack of personality in their leaders, neither of whom was well known or appreciated outside narrow circles. No doubt this aspect may be exaggerated, but it is safe to say that, having regard to the character of the electorate, especially since the establishment of full adult suffrage, personality plays a vitally important part in any election. It must be remembered that the Premier not merely sets the programme in his electoral address, which is therefore studied by all seriously interested in governmental problems. His voice is heard on the radio, he addresses vast gatherings of his constituents, and his speeches are reported at length. Between elections, interest is deliberately concentrated on him by the party press and organisations (n), and no by-election passes without his sending a cordial letter of support to a candidate, of whom he probably knows nothing, despite his assurance to the party that he is deserving of full support. His appeal, the electors know, is not really for support to the candidate as such, but for support to their chosen leader and a candidate who should stand without such endorsement could expect short shrift from the party followers.

(n) See ch. vii. § 2, post.

The Prime Minister's position is thus essentially bound up with the party system. He is the head of the party, exercises a general control over it, and appoints the officials who exercise detailed control and handle the central funds thereof. Without a party backing the position of a Prime Minister is untenable. Sir R. Peel split his party in 1845, and after his defeat in the following year his career was ended. Mr. Lloyd George equally destroyed his party by the election of 1918, and in 1922 realised that with his party he had destroyed his own position, as it has proved, for good. Mr. R. MacDonald in 1931 betrayed, in the view of his party colleagues, the Labour party, and nothing but the policy of Mr. Baldwin, who was willing to enjoy the substance without the form of power, maintained him in office until 1935, though with ever diminishing prestige and increasing discredit as was shown by the crushing blow inflicted on him by the Seaham electorate, and the deep resentment of the electorate of the Scottish Universities, when called upon as a matter of personal loyalty to Mr. Baldwin to find a seat for the ex-Premier in the days of his humiliation, however deserved. On the other hand, Mr. Gladstone recovered from the disaster of 1886 and regained power in 1892 because he had never left his position in the party.

2. The Functions of the Prime Minister.

It is clear that in modern conditions there is no possibility of the Prime Minister holding any other office with substantial duties, and the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, recognises this by giving him the salary of £10,000 a year as Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury. Incidentally his office thus receives, as does the Cabinet, formal recognition of striking character, though the style was used by Lord Beaconsfield when he signed the treaty of Berlin, 1878, and precedence was conferred on the Prime Minister by royal warrant of 1905 (o) immediately after the Archbishop of York, while the Chequers Estate Act, 1917, provides for the use of Chequers by the incumbent of the office. His unique position is further attested by the grant of a pension of £2,000 a year to ex-Prime Ministers, a provision presumably devised to accelerate the retirement of Premiers.

Instances, therefore, of the tenure of other offices are of merely historic interest. Sir R. Peel was Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1834—35, Mr. Gladstone in 1873, when scandals in regard to the Post Office rendered it necessary to make changes in the ministry, took for a time the same office, thus starting a difficult controversy whether this action did not require re-election, though as he was also First Lord of the Treasury that claim was disputable (p). In 1880—82 he combined the tenure of both offices, and in 1923, when Mr. Baldwin became First Lord, he remained for a brief period also Chancellor. Though Mr. N. Chamberlain was Chancellor when he became Prime Minister in 1936, the burden of defending his impost on profits fell on Sir J. Simon, transferred from the Home Office to the Chancellorship.

Lord Salisbury, on the other hand, insisted in 1885—86, 1886—92, and 1895—1900 on holding the Foreign Office, and did not become First Lord, save for a brief period in 1886. From 1900 he was Lord Privy Seal. In 1885, in view of Lord Randolph Churchill's objections to serving under Sir Stafford Northcote as First Lord and leader in the Commons, the latter was translated to the Lords (q). In 1886 Mr. W. H. Smith led the Commons as First Lord, as did Mr. Balfour in the ministry of 1895—1902. In 1924, however, Mr. MacDonald combined the Foreign Secretaryship and the office of First

(o) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 443 f.

(p) Morley, Gladstone, ii. 465 ff.

(q) Letters, 2 s., iii. 663.

Lord, but it is not dubious that the combination overtaxed his capacity and helped to produce that mental weariness, which induced him to bring about the early demise of the Labour ministry (r).

Apart from these exceptional cases the Premier's duties are onerous. He forms, as we have seen, the Cabinet, and, as we shall see, can secure the removal of ministers in order to maintain Cabinet harmony. He presides over its deliberations, and through the Secretariat supervises the punctual execution of Cabinet decisions. He presides over the Committee of Imperial Defence, which has the vital function of preparing national defence. In the Foreign Office business he is essentially concerned, and major issues in other departments should be brought to his notice, so that he may decide whether they should come before the Cabinet. Where departments differ in view he may decide, unless the dispute is so vital as to render Cabinet intervention desirable. Questions of policy are discussed with those ministers immediately concerned, with a view to final decisions by Cabinet. Major appointments of all kinds are made on his recommendation, and other appointments, which primarily appertain to the heads of the departments, are made with his concurrence. For honours he recommends and approves departmental submissions to the King.

On all Cabinet matters he is the channel of communication with the King, and departmental ministers, though they have the right of direct communication with the Crown, keep him informed of matters of importance.

He is normally the leader of the House of Commons, and as such determines, subject to the guidance of the Cabinet, the vital question of priority in time, and the fate of private members' bills, which are often doomed to destruction, unless the ministry determines, as in the case of Mr. Herbert's measure to promote divorces (s), to spare Government time.

(r) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 345 f.

(s) Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937.

He is expected to answer questions on the business of the Commons, to reply to general interrogations not falling within the sphere of individual departments, and to intervene in debates of general importance, such as those on defence, foreign affairs and domestic issues of prime character. At the same time, as head of the party, he is concerned with all issues affecting its operations; he fosters promising young adherents and intervenes to prevent the development of fissures in its cohesion.

He must also guide public opinion by receiving deputations and discussing issues, by public speeches at party conferences, and on other set occasions. He may occasionally appear at international conferences; Mr. Lloyd George made spectacular use of the Peace Conference of Paris to show himself as a master of diplomacy, dictating a wise peace to a war-worn Europe. He may receive, especially in a crisis, foreign representatives, as when on the occasion of the overthrow of Dr. Schuschnigg's régime in Austria Mr. Chamberlain protested to Herr von Ribbentrop against the violation of international law involved, regardless of the fact that he had invited it by the determination to recognise the importance of a fait accompli in the shape of the annexation of Ethiopia.

The Prime Minister also presides at the rare but important meetings of the Imperial Conference, when there is expected from him a declaration of the loyalty of the Commonwealth to the Crown and its attitude towards foreign affairs. He conducts relations in matters of Cabinet rank with the Dominions; an example of classical importance (t) was afforded by the negotiations over the mode in which effect should be given to the abdication of the King in the unhappy event of his refusing to abstain from contracting a matrimonial alliance with a lady of American origin, who had already divorced two husbands.

Finally, it is to the Prime Minister that heads of departments

(t) Described by Mr. Baldwin in the Commons, December 10th, 1936.
See ch. viii. § 1 (b), post.

turn in case of urgent emergency, where Cabinet sanction is normally needed, but where time forbids its being obtained. In such a case the Prime Minister has implied authority to decide, certain of homologation later by the Cabinet (u).

In the execution of these duties, difficulties have most frequently arisen in the sphere of foreign affairs, because it will always be far from easy to adjust the necessary measure of independence of the minister and the control of the Prime Minister. No doubt the Cabinet must determine the broad lines of policy, but that leaves many important and urgent issues to be disposed of as they arise. In the history of Lord Palmerston's connection with the Foreign Office, friction with his chief was seldom long absent, and the position was aggravated, because the minister's views were in a broad sense Liberal, and were seldom shared by the Queen, who with better reason (x) objected to his habit of action without her prior approval, and his tendency to interpret too freely the approval that she might happen to have accorded to lines of action. Lord John Russell was urged to watch his proceedings, and freely amended his despatches, finally going to the extreme length of demanding that they should be submitted for his approval before going to the Queen (y), though this was not repeated later. He had, of course, the excellent excuse that otherwise he would be the recipient of vehement protests from his irate sovereign, prompted, no doubt, by Prince Albert. But this drastic procedure did not prevent indiscretions, which ended Lord Palmerston's tenure of that office, as has been noted above. After that the rule was rather close co-operation, and consultation on all matters of importance not too vital to demand Cabinet concurrence. This is attested of Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet and of Lord Palmerston's ministries (z), and Mr. Gladstone used to arrange (u) Mr. Disraeli's purchase of Suez Canal shares was on his own initiative with royal approval, and he had hard work to persuade his Cabinet: Letters 2 s., ii. 363, 427 f., 434; Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 157 f.

(x) Bell, Palmerston, i. 423, 434 ff., 437 ff.

(y) One note to Baron Koller on the attack on Haynau had to be recalled: Letters, 1 s., ii. 269.

(z) Argyll, Autobiography, i. 445.

matters with Lord Clarendon and then with Lord Granville, and finally with Lord Rosebery (a), so that, when issues came before the Cabinet, they appeared in the almost incontrovertible form of policies agreed upon by the essential experts. Lord Beaconsfield was less happy in the essential issue of the Russian attack on Turkey, for Lord Derby proved hard to handle, and the Prime Minister resorted to employment of an agent of his own behind his Foreign Secretary's back, while he was able to rely on royal aid to impress the Cabinet. Lord Derby at last showed his resentment of being reduced to the status of an Under-Secretary by resignation, being replaced by the then more complaisant Lord Salisbury (b). Lord Salisbury, himself normally as Foreign Secretary, controlled foreign policy, but otherwise he deprecated undue interference by the Prime Minister (c). On the other hand he advocated that, so far as possible, the Foreign Secretary should settle issues with the Prime Minister and the Queen to the exclusion of the Cabinet (d).

Lord Salisbury's view seems to have been followed in his own practice, at least in so far as he managed much business with the approval of the sovereign alone. This tendency, followed by Mr. Balfour and his Foreign Secretary, who worked most harmoniously, was exemplified in the conversations with French military experts, which were approved in 1905 without formal Cabinet advice. They were renewed and extended to Belgium after the formation of the Liberal ministry by accord between the Prime Minister, Sir E. Grey (e) and Mr. Haldane, while Lord Ripon, who then spoke for the Foreign Office in the Lords, was duly informed. It is easy to understand how this accord seemed at the time sufficient to give assent, and it must be remembered that from the outset the conversations were marked out as essentially technical,

(a) Crewe, Rosebery, i. 277.

(b) Letters, 2 s., ii. 583 ff.

(c) For Lord Iddeleigh's defects, see Esher, Journals, i. 135.

(d) Letters, 3 s., i. 45. Cf. 48, 211.

(e) Twenty-five Years, i. 74 f., 86 f., 94 f.; Spender, Campbell-Bannerman, ii. 252 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 184 ff.

though it might certainly have occurred to the ministers concerned that the result of such conversations must be to convey to France the impression that the principle of co-operation in the event of a German attack on France was accepted as valid. It remains obscure why the other ministers were not given the means of knowing of these conversations. It has been suggested that this was a case of accidental oversight (f), but Mr. Asquith appears to have realised their existence in 1911, when he felt that they involved danger. It must, however, be remembered that these were busy years, and that ministers often fail to study even the papers circulated to them. Mr. Spender is evidence for the ignorance of Lord Loreburn on matters with which every well-informed journalist was acquainted, and on the whole it may be deemed proper to hold that ministers were mainly ignorant, but that this ignorance was partly their own fault, especially in the case of those who attended meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence. At any rate the searching investigation of defence issues, which was carried out in connection with the Imperial Conference meeting of 1911, and the visit of the Canadian Premier in 1912, led to fuller knowledge, and the Cabinet in the latter year properly secured from the French Government a formal agreement that the conversations (g) imposed no obligation to aid on the British Government. What is surprising and what shows the Cabinet in rather a foolish light, is the view that the situation could really be treated in this way. Moreover, France had in reliance on Britain, concentrated from 1912 her fleet mainly in the Mediterranean, with the obvious result that Britain must tacitly be deemed to have undertaken the defence of the French coast (h). The Cabinet should plainly have faced the fact that its action must compel support of France in the event of attack. In 1914 the complementary step of conversations with Russian representatives received Cabinet approval (i), and once more the ministry should have faced frankly the implication of its action.

(f) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 179, 348 f.

(g) Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 96 ff.

(h) Churchill, World Crisis, 1914—19, pp. 201 ff. For the agreements in 1913, see Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 601—605.

In the ultimate issue this failure to appreciate the position proved damaging. In 1914, at the crisis between Austria and Serbia, followed by strained relations between Russia and Austria, which inevitably involved Germany and France, it was impossible for Sir E. Grey (k) to give the necessary assurance to France or warning to Germany, and the issue fell to be decided only by the action of Germany in invading Belgium which brought all the Cabinet round to the necessity of war, with the exceptions only of Lord Morley and Mr. J. Burns. Earlier Mr. Lloyd George and Sir J. Simon had been firm against intervention, thus doing much to render war inevitable. The actual refusal on July 30th, 1914, to accept the German terms for British neutrality was despatched by accord between the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, and approved immediately afterwards by the Cabinet (l), and the ultimatum to Germany was treated in like manner (m), but the ministers acted in accordance with a policy which had been accepted by the Cabinet. The episode illustrates admirably the controlling power of the Cabinet. It is impossible to blame Sir E. Grey for his inability to deal more effectively with the crisis by making it clear that Britain must succour France. He had no authority thus to pledge his country, and he could not have obtained it prior to the violation of Belgian neutrality which affected a principle so dear to British diplomacy that Mr. Gladstone had been prepared in 1870 to intervene with armed force if France or Prussia had violated Belgian territory (n). The fons et origo

(i) Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 285; 63 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 458; Halévy, pp. 606 ff.

(k) Churchill, op. cit., pp. 203 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 86 ff.; Twenty-five Years, i. 308 ff.; ii. 1 ff.; Halévy, pp. 650 ff.

(l) Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 327 ff.

(m) Churchill, World Crisis, 1911–14, p. 220; but Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 92, suggests a Cabinet just before.

(n) Guedalla, i. 248 ff.; Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 32 ff.

mali was the failure of the Cabinet earlier to grasp the implications of the situation and of the inevitable consequences of the conversations they had approved without evidently understanding what they were doing.

War begun, control of foreign policy became bound up with military and naval operations and the heads of the Admiralty and War Office necessarily shared with the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister the burden of planning policy, which, as Sir E. Grey has often insisted, was vitally determined at every step by the success or failure of British arms and the actions of the allied powers. Even so, final control rested with the Cabinet, to which were submitted for confirmation the decisions reached by the ministers who came to act formally as a War Committee (o). These discussions naturally caused delay, and, for good or evil, Mr. Lloyd George, in sympathy with Mr. Bonar Law, formed the conclusion that it was essential to constitute a Committee with wide executive authority. Mr. George's aim undoubtedly was to secure the removal from immediate connection with the direction of the war of the Prime Minister whose capacity he underrated. The result was the resignation of Mr. Asquith, and the creation of the War Cabinet, which gave Mr. George full scope. The Foreign Secretary was not included in that select body, and Mr. George became supreme in foreign policy, aided by the miscellaneous secretariat which he created to rival the Foreign Office. The Armistice was followed by his period of negotiation at the Peace Conference; we are assured that he often consulted Lord Balfour (p), but also that he did not deem it essential to do so, still less to obtain his concurrence for the line of action proposed. The fate of Lord Curzon (q) after Lord Balfour's retirement was much worse, for, while Mr. George had respect and liking for his late Foreign Secretary, he had no love for Lord Curzon, and his settlement at London and St. Remo of the principles of the abortive treaty of Sèvres was far from acceptable to the latter. The gravamen of the Foreign Secretary's complaint was unanswerable; he did not deny the right of decision of the Prime Minister, but he did deny the propriety of a system by which he maintained in his garden at 10, Downing Street, virtually a second Foreign Office, whose doings were communicated sporadically and partially to the Foreign Minister. It is difficult not to feel that in the circumstances the decision of Lord Curzon to countenance the revolt against the Prime Minister was excusable, even if his modus operandi (r) was open to the accusation of bad faith.

(o) Cf. Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 186 ff., 253 ff.; Lloyd George, War Memoirs, ii. 973 ff.

(p) Dugdale, ii. 263 ff. For Balfour's views on the inevitability of friction, see p. 293.

(q) Ronaldshay, iii. 259 ff., 271 ff., 314 ff.; Dugdale, ii. 291 ff.; Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 23 ff., 57 ff., 173, 213, 214.

The fall of Mr. George restored relations to normal, while in 1924, foreign policy remained in the hands of the Prime Minister. In the ministry of 1924—29 the position of Mr. A. Chamberlain was satisfactory, for the Prime Minister placed high confidence in him, especially after the success of Locarno which gave him the Garter, and the Foreign Secretary resumed a reasonable discretion, subject to consultation with the Prime Minister and the general control of the Cabinet. The Prime Minister's control was decidedly increased in the Labour government of 1929—31, for Mr. MacDonald was anxious to resume his activities in the field of foreign affairs, and for this reason his relations with Mr. Henderson lacked cordiality and paved the way for their abrupt parting in 1931. With Sir John Simon in office in the National government, the Foreign Secretary's position manifestly grew stronger, for the Prime Minister obviously continued to play that rôle, not by virtue of popular approval, but through the support of his Conservative and Liberal allies. The change of Prime Minister in 1935 rather strengthened than otherwise the position of the Foreign Secretary, but the shock produced by the Hoare-Laval agreement which necessitated the hasty resignation of the Foreign Secretary could hardly have been possible if the Prime Minister had been sufficiently alert in supervising the Foreign Secretary's work. It may, indeed, fairly be deduced from Mr. Baldwin's very unconvincing apologia that he had been permitting Sir S. Hoare too much freedom, forgetting the obvious intellectual limitations and lack of experience in foreign issues of his amiable and well-meaning colleague (s).

(r) Nicolson, p. 280. For the demerits of the secretariat in Council business, see Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 784 f.

On the other hand, Mr. Eden's policy appears to have been much more effectively dictated by the Cabinet, because his attitude in regard to the abandonment of sanctions was inconsistent with his past line of action, and was evidently dictated by a Cabinet decision which represented the views of Mr. N. Chamberlain, announced indeed in public (t) prior to any indication by the Prime Minister of his determination to violate the obligations imposed on Britain by the League Covenant. The subsequent policy of the ministry of Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Halifax as Foreign Secretary seems to have been more and more determined by the Premier until, bowing to what Mr. Eden and Lord Cranbourne regarded, no doubt rightly, as an ultimatum, Mr. Chamberlain determined to open negotiations with Italy, and thus compelled Mr. Eden to resign on February 20th, 1938.

In regard to other departments of State the activity of the Prime Minister is mainly concerned with emergencies or with inter-departmental conflicts. The war crisis of 1914 necessitated immediate action to relieve the Bank of England (u) from its obligations to pay cash under the Bank Charter Act, and following the precedents of 1847, 1857 and 1866, this took the form of an authority signed by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer; this and other action was speedily legalised by the Legislature. In these

(s) For a severe criticism of Mr. Baldwin, see Toynbee, Int. Affairs, 1935, ii. 314 ff.

(t) June 10th, 1938; Toynbee, ii. 443 ff.

(u) Lloyd George, War Memoirs, i. 103 ff.

and other cases the Prime Minister acts with the full assent of the department and often at its request. It is a different thing to interfere without such request, though the Prime Minister has an obvious right to ask for and obtain whatever information he may wish from ministers (x), and to lay down for their guidance the class of papers which he desires to see. But the danger of intervention was neatly shown when the Queen's anxiety to secure the Bombay command in the army in India for the Duke of Connaught (y), induced her to send a communication to the Viceroy through the then Prime Minister. The Secretary of State, Lord R. Churchill, tendered his resignation, and only withdrew it when the Prime Minister explained that he only telegraphed because the Viceroy had not the Queen's cypher and that there was no intention of pressing him to make the appointment. In fact, on a rather thin excuse, it was refused.

The Prime Minister is on stronger grounds when one department appeals against the attitude of another, as when in 1907, Mr. Haldane induced him to insist on the submission to the Committee of Imperial Defence of a document which it was unwilling to put before that body (z). Clearly the Premier had in such a case not merely the right, but the duty to insist on the production of the paper. Mr. Lloyd George, in like manner, induced Mr. Asquith to arrange for the transfer to his care as Minister of Munitions of responsibility for the design of shells, which lay normally in the province of the War Office (a), and in the same year, 1915 (b), he himself tells us that he successfully intervened with Mr. Asquith to thwart the intention of the War Office to send home from Russia an officer whose reports were deemed too pessimistic. But, if we are to trust Sir H. Wilson (c), his attempt as Prime (x) Cf. Lord Palmerston's efforts to control Panmure: Bell, ii. 121—125.

 (y) Letters, 2 s., iii. 689 f.; 703.

(z) Mr. Balfour's memo. on invasion; Esher, Journals, ii. 246 ff.; for his evidence, 316 ff.

(a) Addison, Four and a Half Years, i. 146 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 136 ff.

(b) War Memoirs, i. 457.

(c) Callwell, Wilson, ii. 285.

Minister in 1921 to remove the officer commanding the home district who had fallen short of his standard in dealing with a request for information was modified by the remonstrances of the War Minister. In most cases, no doubt, the influence of the Prime Minister, whether within or without the Cabinet, is devoted to conciliation and the effort to arrange a compromise. The task has, no doubt, been of special difficulty in the field of the disputes between the Admiralty and the Air Ministry over the control of the Fleet Air Arm, just as the original establishment (d) of the Air Ministry was the slow outcome of much inter-departmental bickering. The result achieved in 1936 bears every sign of a compromise in the authority over aircraft based on land though used for naval purposes reserved to the Air Ministry.

In the war period, of course, the Prime Minister and the Cabinet were vitally concerned with the conduct of the war and the ministers in charge of the departments neither could nor did expect to be given a free hand. The question was discussed during the Crimean War (e) how far the Prime Minister could push his views regarding the General to be employed in charge of the forces, but Lord Panmure proved extremely firm in the support he gave to General Simpson, nor was Lord Raglan recalled despite his very moderate capacity for conducting, successfully, operations and his difficulties in co-operating with the French forces. In the Great War difficulties were incessant, especially between Lord Kitchener and Mr. Lloyd George, with the Prime Minister keeping the peace (f), and Mr. Lloyd George was so dissatisfied with Mr. Balfour's control of the Admiralty that he forced him to resign, and though he accepted his co-operation outside his War Cabinet, removed him to the Foreign Office (g).

(d) Cf. Balfour's opposition, Dugdale, ii. 158 f.; J. M. Spaight, The Beginnings of Organised Air Power.

(e) Fitzmaurice, Draville, i. 114 ff. Lord Panmure increased the pay of the expeditionary force without Cabinet authority, but it was felt necessary to keep him in office: Bell, Palmerston, ii. 121 ff.

(f) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 139 f.

(g) Dugdale, ii. 182.

Mr. Lloyd George was, until February, 1918, engaged in efforts to secure the acceptance of his ideas of how the war should be conducted as opposed to the objections of Sir W. Robertson (h), Chief of the Imperial General Staff, and Sir D. Haig. The former he drove to resignation of that post, but the latter he dare not dismiss. Lord Derby throughout could play but a secondary part, and Mr. Balfour was charged only with a quite futile attempt to induce Sir W. Robertson to remain in an unsuitable post (i). The difficulties of the conflict in these cases are inevitable, even if they were aggravated by the temperament of the Prime Minister. But the grave error made by Mr. Churchill (k) in bringing Sir J. Fisher back to the Admiralty on the resignation of Prince Louis of Battenberg on the unfair ground of parentage was homologated by the Prime Minister, and brought on Britain and the Ministry grievous injury; it should have been plain that an Admiral who could seriously propose in December, 1914 (l), an invasion of Schleswig Holstein had ceased to be a competent adviser, and the Gallipoli disaster was greatly contributed to by his attitude (m). His failure to make clear his views to the War Council was quite inexcusable, and the only conclusion to be arrived at is that Lord Fisher had passed the period of his usefulness.

The resignation of Lord Fisher (n) succeeded in forcing a coalition Government, which fatally delayed the possibility of saving the position at the Dardanelles by effective action, but the new First Lord on the removal of Mr. Churchill, was himself opposed to evacuation, and supported the idea of maintaining the position (o); he did not, however, attempt to (h) Soldiers and Statesmen.

(i) Dugdale, ii. 239 f. See Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 223 ff.

(k) World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 402 ff.

(l) World Crisis, 1915, pp. 44 f. (m) World Crisis, 1915, pp. 352 ff.

(n) Churchill, World Crisis, 1915, pp. 358—365. Lord Fisher refused to obey the written order of the Prime Minister in the name of the King to resume duty which he threw up at a moment's notice, and was even less willing to serve under Mr. Balfour: Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 164, n 1: Oxford, Memories, ii. 90—94.

(o) Dugdale, ii. 153—155.

influence the Sea Lords to accept the advice of Admiral Wemyss to use the naval force to penetrate the Dardanelles and save the situation. The Cabinet also concurred, and a decision to evacuate was taken, which is probably open to the wholesale condemnation of it made by Mr. Churchill (p). Certainly the extreme luck, which allowed the evacuation to be carried out without substantial loss, could not have been anticipated, and on the face of the facts the decision to reject the Admiral's offer seems most unwise.

It seems clear that the decision (q) of Mr. Balfour to replace Sir J. Jackson at the close of 1916, just before the formation of the new coalition, was one pressed by the Prime Minister. His own preference seems to have been for asking Sir J. Jellicoe to accept a special office in the Admiralty for work against submarine attack. The case is of interest, because Sir E. Grey (r) was moved by the success of the submarines to suggest to Mr. Balfour, despite his reluctance to express views on other ministers' departments, the grave importance of a more effective counter-campaign on the submarine. No doubt the desirability of placing in the ministry a First Lord of great determination was the motive for Mr. Balfour's supersession, but Sir E. Carson was certainly not a success in the task.

It remains to note a very curious incident, which shows Lord Salisbury not unwilling to shelter behind actions of a colleague, which he had been informed of in advance, and which he had in substance sanctioned (s). The attempt of Lord Carnarvon, in substantial degree successful, to establish a working arrangement between Mr. Parnell and the Conservatives could not finally be homologated by his chief, and, when the matter leaked out, Lord Salisbury's account of it to the Queen (t) can only be described as disingenuous. The truth, of course, was that as the matter had not succeeded, though it gave the Conservatives a good many Irish votes at (p) World Crisis, 1915, pp. 503—505.

(q) Dugdale, ii. 163—165.

(r) Dugdale, ii. 163.

(s) Gladstone, After Thirty Years, pp. 387—423.

(t) Letters, 3 s., i. 147.

the general election, Lord Salisbury was only too anxious to conceal from the Queen actions which he would not have ventured to ask her to approve in advance, knowing as he did her bitter dislike of Mr. Parnell. It is more easy to admire Lord Salisbury's skill than his sense of candour or fairness to a colleague (u).

3. The Removal of Ministers.

Ministers, as we have seen, are appointed by the King on the advice of the Premier, and they can be removed on like advice, unless, of course, the Crown is prepared to refuse assent and to find a ministry to replace that existing. Removal, of course, is always a strong step. It is seldom that a minister has not some following in the Commons, some support in the Cabinet itself, some popularity outside the House. Removal, therefore, indicates defective judgment in placing the minister in office, or suggests error of policy on the part of the Premier. These considerations explain abundantly the fact that ministers of very poor calibre may remain in office long after it would seem desirable that they should be honourably retired with, if need be, a peerage to soften the blow. An alternative to removal is transfer to another office with less work, or possibility of error being committed.

Technically, formal dismissal is hardly known, since Pitt gave the King the choice between him and Thurlow in 1792. It could take place only on the advice and responsibility of the Premier. Queen Victoria, according to Prince Albert, had contemplated in the controversy in 1851 dismissing Lord Palmerston on her own initiative (x), but had shrank from using the power of the Crown, as her action would have been criticised without the possibility of making a public defence. Patently such action would have been wholly unconstitutional; her right was to urge action on her Prime Minister. On the other hand there can be no doubt of the right of the Premier to ask a colleague to resign; Mr. Gladstone (y), however, in the case of Lord Carlingford, who would not surrender his office of Privy Seal, which was to have been given to Lord Rosebery, was dubious as to the propriety of carrying the matter further, but Lord Carlingford did resign at the close of the year. It is clearly undignified for a minister to hesitate to resign if asked. He can often take his revenge by opposition in the Commons.

(u) For an apologia, see Lady G. Cecil, iii. 147—184.

(x) Letters, 1 s., ii. 343, n.

The powers of the Premier, and the dangers of their use, are illustrated in the classic case of Lord Palmerston. Queen Victoria disliked from 1848 the Liberalism of his policy, as well as his often curious methods of giving effect to it, and she would gladly have seen him in another office. She complained of his sending despatches before she had seen them, and of his departing from policies which she had approved, but Lord Palmerston refused to leave his office, except by resignation, based on a request by the Queen or the Cabinet, and Lord John Russell was too much in sympathy with his subordinate's outlook to be able to press for resignation especially after his brilliant success in vindicating his action in the matter of his treatment of Greece in the case of Don Pacifico (z). All that could be done was to lay down a principle for his guidance, which he duly accepted (a):—

“ She requires: .(1) that he will distinctly state what he proposes in a given case, in order that the Queen may know as distinctly to what she has given her royal sanction; (2) having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered or modified by the minister; such an act she must consider as failing in sincerity towards the Crown, and justly to be visited by the exercise of her constitutional right of dismissing that minister. She expects to be kept informed of what passes between him and the Foreign Ministers before important decisions are taken, based upon that intercourse, to receive the foreign despatches in good time, and to have the drafts for her approval sent to her in sufficient time to make herself acquainted with their contents before they must be sent off."

(y) Gardiner, Harcourt, i. 508 f. Lord Carlingford became Lord President.

(z) Letters, s. 1. ii. 263; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 29 ff.

(a) Letters, s. 1. ii. 264. This was suggested (March 12th) by Baron Stockmar (ibid. 238).

In 1851 Lord Palmerston offended seriously by his desire to receive Kossuth on his arrival in exile, but yielded not to the Premier's request, but to the decision of the Cabinet (b). He retaliated by receiving deputations, whose addresses, with more accuracy than courtesy, described the Emperors of Russia and Austria as "odious and detestable assassins," but not even this moved the Cabinet to action (c). But Lord Palmerston betrayed himself to his enemies by his rashness in expressing to the French Ambassador approval of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état after the Queen had urged, and the Cabinet had decided on, an attitude of neutrality on the issue. Even then Lord John Russell, while informing the offender, whose evil deed had been revealed officially in a despatch from the British Ambassador at Paris, who had learned of his indiscretion, when he communicated the official attitude on Lord Palmerston's instructions to the French Government, that the conduct of foreign affairs could no longer be left in his hands with advantage to the country, softened the blow by offering the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland with a British peerage if desired. Lord Palmerston preferred resignation, duly accepted by the Queen on the Premier's advice, while the Cabinet also approved his action (d). Lord Palmerston, of course, defended his action in the Commons, while admitting the right of the Premier to ask for his resignation. But admittedly his defence fell flat and failed to explain satisfactorily his remarks to the French ambassador. But his revenge on Lord John Russell was not long delayed, for in 1852 he brought down the ministry on the issue of the militia bill.

(b) Letters, s. 1, ii. 326 f.

(c) Letters, s. 1, ii. 329 ff.
 (d) Letters, s. 1, ii. 343 ff. Lord J. Russell admitted later being "hasty and precipitate": Recollections, pp. 257 f.

The precedent was not such as to encourage action. Mr. Gladstone had no love for Mr. Ayrton, but in 1872 (e) he explained to the Queen, who had suggested removal two years earlier, that it was necessary to make out a case intelligible to the public for removing him, and action was delayed until 1873, when the occurrence of irregularities in post office business caused Mr. Gladstone to transfer Mr. Lowe from the Exchequer to the Home Office, and to make Mr. Ayrton judge advocate-general, while the resignation of Mr. Monsell was simply accepted (f). Mr. Gladstone also solved the question of the unpopularity of Mr. Bruce as Home Secretary, by making him President of the Council, while in 1867 Mr. Walpole was induced to resign without any public discredit and without being formally removed from the Cabinet. Mr. Disraeli, however, in 1875 found the removal of Sir C. Adderley from the Board of Trade would be too difficult, and dropped the project (g), and the experience of Mr. Gladstone with Lord Carlingford was similar, as already noted. Even Lord Salisbury shrank from dismissing his unpopular Home Secretary, Mr. Matthews, and the matter was decorously settled by the grant of a peerage (h). In 1900 the reconstruction of the Cabinet by dropping Mr. H. Chaplin and Sir M. White-Ridley secured the supremacy of the Hotel Cecil Unlimited, and Mr. Balfour's eventual succession as Premier (i).

Mr. Balfour was confronted in 1903 with a greater difficulty, for he was anxious to rid himself of his free trade colleagues, and they were by no means eager to leave office if they could be assured that the Prime Minister did not intend to yield to the demands of Mr. Chamberlain. By a device, which only a

(c) Letters, 2 s., ii. 225.

(f) Letters, 2 s., ii. 270—276; Guedalla, i. 420—426.

(g) Childe-Pemberton, Norton, p. 222.

(h) Letters, 3 s., i. 646.

(i) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 610

master of dialectic can regard as otherwise than a rather shabby trick, he allowed them to resign office in ignorance that Mr. Chamberlain had already resigned, and thus was able to fill their places by men of subordinate standing, whom he could control, but he thus injured gravely his reputation and the chance of an effective ministry (k).

Normally, the time when ministers can be changed is on the coming into being of a new Government, and Mr. Asquith, while he took over in the main his predecessor's ministers, was able to rid himself of Lord Elgin, who had not managed colonial affairs with tact or distinction, and who on general issues maintained in Cabinet a discreet silence, and to transfer Lord Tweedmouth from the Admiralty (l). In 1911 an obscure incident occurred. It was suggested that the Admiralty should be remodelled on the analogy of the War Office, and Mr. Haldane's transfer thither was thought possible. But in the ultimate issue Mr. Mackenna was induced to go to the Home Office, and Mr. Churchill was given the Admiralty, but no very effective changes were made in its organisation (m). The episode is important, chiefly from the fact that part of the disasters of the war might have been avoided had not the Admiralty at the beginning of the war been under the control of two such ill-balanced colleagues as Mr. Churchill and Lord Fisher.

In the same spirit Mr. Baldwin took advantage of his accession to power in 1935 to make changes in his ministry, including the supersession of Lord Londonderry and of Lord Sankey, since readmitted to the Labour fold. In 1937 Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Runciman and Lord Monsell resigned.

Where incompatibility exists, it is always possible for the minister to relieve the situation by resignation, and there are abundant precedents, as that of Mr. Forster in 1882, though Mr. Gladstone was very reluctant to lose a valuable colleague in this case (n). In 1873 both Mr. Lowe and Mr. Ayrton placed their resignation in his hands. The resignation of Mr. Balfour's colleagues has been referred to, and in 1914 Colonel Seely, who had shown lack of resolution and common-sense in dealing with the officers in Ulster, wisely resigned from the War Office, thereby permitting the Prime Minister to restore order by himself taking that post for the time being, to relinquish it to Lord Kitchener on the outbreak of war (o). The resignation in 1917 of Mr. A. Chamberlain from the India Office was of a different character, for the ghastly mismanagement of the Mesopotamian expedition was a responsibility far more incumbent on the failure of the Viceroy, but his demission of office was a loyal tribute to constitutional theory. Very curious was the sacrifice (p) of Sir S. Hoare in 1935 after the public indignation felt at the Hoare-Laval proposals regarding Ethiopia. The Cabinet had approved, and acceptance of his resignation was merely an ingenious device for avoiding the force of public resentment of the complete deviation from the pledges on which the election of 1935 had been fought. How unreal the resignation was became clear by the early restoration of the minister to office, and the deliberate violation in July, 1936, of the British obligations under the League Covenant towards Ethiopia. It is clear that neither the minister nor the Premier was sincere in the resignation.

(k) Holland, Devonshire, ii. 351 ff. Fitzroy, Memoirs, i. 149—158, shows the King's disquiet: Dugdale, Balfour, i. 355 ff.

(l) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 198.

(m) World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 59 ff., 82 ff.; Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 466 f.

One case during the existence of the coalition after the war is interesting, because the term "dismissal" actually occurs in the Prime Minister's reference to it in his correspondence with Lord Curzon on one of the few occasions when they appear in substantial union of view. The episode, which had the unfortunate effect of depriving India of further service from the acute brain of Mr. Montagu was due to the activities of the Khilafat Committee in India, which was only too ready to make any accusation against Britain. It asserted that (n) Letters, 2 s., iii. 276, 279.

(p) Int. Affairs, 1935, ii. 67 ff.

(o) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 41—47.

Britain proposed to furnish further aid to Greece against Turkey, and, to counter this misstatement, the Viceroy asked leave to publish a declaration which indicated sympathy with Turkish aspirations. Permission was given by Mr. Montagu without consulting the Cabinet, and publication took place on March 4th, 1922. This resulted in bitter reproaches from Lord Curzon (q). The incident was debated in Cabinet, and Mr. Montagu, not Lord Curzon, resigned. Mr. Lloyd George, who was unquestionably very hostile to the Turks, supported Lord Curzon for once, sympathised with him and assured him on March 9th that "the dismissal of Montagu will make an undoubted impression, both in Paris and Angora." Yet this co-operation did not prevent Lord Curzon from retiring to Hackwood on September 16th, leaving it to the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill in particular to issue the famous communiqué warning the Turks that they must not cross to the European shore, which undoubtedly saved the situation, and which reflects great credit on those responsible. On the other hand, when he returned to work Lord Curzon showed judgment in deeming unnecessary the ultimatum which on September 29th his colleagues desired to send to Turkey, but which Sir Charles Harington and Sir Horace Rumbold wisely withheld, to receive later on the thanks of the Cabinet (r), then about to dissolve, as a result in substantial measure of the defection of Lord Curzon and Mr. Baldwin, together with the resumption of political leadership by Mr. Bonar Law.

One episode akin to dismissal is famous for its tragic sequel (s). In 1886 the resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill, as a result of the refusal of the Cabinet to support his objections to the estimates, resulted in Lord Salisbury's determination to place Mr. Goschen in the office of Chancellor. Mr. Goschen objected to Lord Iddesleigh remaining at the Foreign Office, and Lord Salisbury decided to assume that department himself. He then argued for the benefit of the Queen that his action was necessary to leave the post of First Lord of the Treasury vacant for Mr. W. H. Smith, as leader of the Commons. Unfortunately Lord Iddesleigh was by gross carelessness allowed to learn from the press of his supersession, and his death shortly after could not be disconnected from his unfortunate and stupid treatment, though other office might have been found for him, had he so desired.

(q) Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 267 f.

(r) Nicolson, pp. 274 ff.; Churchill, The Aftermath, pp. 409 ff.; Gwynn, Imperial Policing, pp. 118 ff.

(s) Lady G. Cecil, Salisbury, iii. 339 ff.; Esher, Journals, i. 133—135; Letters, 3 s., i. 249, 251 ff.

The proper form for resignation by a minister is clearly an intimation to the Prime Minister, who then submits it for royal acceptance. Only then is publication proper. But Lord R. Churchill, who has not been the only sinner on this score, wrote to Lord Salisbury, who received the letter on a Thursday, while the news was in the press next morning (t). It is not surprising that the Queen was displeased at action so discourteous, especially as he had just been at Windsor, and had not then mentioned a word to her of his difficulties with his colleagues.

The Crown, of course, has no real power to refuse to accept a resignation, as opposed to the right to dissuade it, which it has at times employed. In 1855 the Aberdeen ministry on the defection of Lord J. Russell was anxious to resign, but the Queen protested (u) against their proposal and on reconsideration they stayed until actually defeated in the Commons on Mr. Roebuck's motion for an enquiry into the conduct of the war. In 1866 (x) she endeavoured to prevent the resignation of Lord Russell's ministry, but in vain. In 1905 Edward VII. would clearly have preferred that Mr. Balfour should not have resigned (y), but no effort was made to show that the Crown had any power to refuse to accept the decision of the Cabinet to this effect.

(t) Letters, 3 s., i. 232 ff. A mysterious case of removal without explanation to the Queen was criticised by her in 1884, that of J. G. Dodson, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster: Guedalla, ii. 306 f.

(u) Letters, 1 s., iii. 73. Lord John sent to the Queen a copy of his request to the Premier to submit his resignation. For the usual form, see Mallet, Cave, p. 216, and Mr. Eden to Mr. Chamberlain, February 20th, 1938.

(x) Guedalla, i. 43.

(y) For his reasons, see Dugdale, i. 424, 428.

CHAPTER IV.

THE WORKING OF THE CABINET SYSTEM.

1. The Functions of the Cabinet.

THE Cabinet is historically a body of Privy Councillors, who possess the confidence of the King, and by modern usage that confidence is due to the fact that they enjoy the support of the major portion of the House of Commons, and thus for a time at least of the major portion of the electorate. The great majority of the members are necessarily the heads of the administrative departments, though ministers with portfolios of no great complexity, or even without portfolio, may be included for the sake of their advice, and their ability to find time easily to serve on Cabinet committees. Common to all members is the fact that they have been duly sworn of the Privy Council, pledging themselves to faithful service and secrecy on Cabinet business. There is no other condition for membership of the Cabinet than membership of the Council, and the invitation of the Prime Minister, but the King is, as a matter of course, informed of the decision of the latter to add to his Cabinet. Mention has already been made of the fact that the list of offices, which are normally held by members of the Cabinet, has been in some degree stereotyped by the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, but there is still no binding rule to compel a Cabinet thus to be constituted.

The size of the Cabinet is determined by the function of government, and the Cabinet thus must grow with the incursion of the ministry into many fields. Sir R. Peel in 1841 was content with thirteen members, Mr. Disraeli in 1874 tried as few as twelve. But the reduction did not avoid ill-luck, for Sir C. Adderley, the President of the Board of Trade, had a Merchant Shipping Bill to carry, and, largely no doubt because he was not in the Cabinet, he failed to secure its support for the measure which had to be dropped (a). The principle is clear that any department which has not a representative in the Cabinet is likely to be denied a fair consideration, not from any inherent defect of the members of the Cabinet, but for the simple reason that intimate knowledge of any subject is necessary if its claims to the consideration of the Cabinet and Parliament are to receive full recognition. The increase of imperial responsibilities and the growth of local government and health problems, of labour and transport problems, and of education, together with the essential importance of agriculture and fisheries, present causes demanding increase of the Cabinet. More recently the necessity of the co-ordination of defence has added a minister of first rate standing, and in 1938 the Commons' demand for a minister in that House, compelled the assignment to the Cabinet of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. A ministry of twenty-one or twenty-two members seems the least now possible.

In the selection of ministers the Prime Minister must have regard to many considerations, including skill in debate, as not less important than administrative capacity, while popularity cannot be ignored, and ability to get on with colleagues and members of Parliament alike counts. These considerations must be borne in mind when the apparent deficiency of a Cabinet in the qualities best suited for the functions which it must perform is criticised. Premiers often doubtless recognise the deficiencies of their protégés, but feel that they can do no better under the conditions.

An authoritative statement of these functions is given by the Machinery of Government Committee, 1918 (b). They comprise (a) the final determination of the policy to be submitted to Parliament; (b) the supreme control of the national executive in accordance with the policy prescribed by Parliament; and (c) the continuous co-ordination and delimitation of the authorities of the several departments of State. A profound change has taken place since the first third of the nineteenth century, for legislation is now incumbent on any ministry as its mode of meeting public sentiment, and a ministry which, like that of Mr. Balfour in 1905, has no serious legislative programme to propose, feels itself unfitted to face the electorate (c). Administration, of course, is also of fundamental importance, and the Cabinet has fuller control over the departments than over Parliament. In legislation, however, its control over the members of the ministry is complete, for no Bill can be promoted, except with its sanction, and the Home Affairs Committee of the Cabinet has the duty of considering at the commencement of each session what Bills the ministry is to bring forward, for there are always more available under present conditions than can ever be carried in one session through the Houses, and there is an honourable and natural rivalry between ministers to secure the opportunity for publicity and public favour won by successful handling in Parliament of a great enactment.

(a) Childe-Pemberton, Norton, p. 220. Mr. Disraeli would have liked to dismiss him (p. 222).

(b) Parl. Pap. C. 9230, p. 5.

All matters of importance in the administrative sphere, including, of course, departmental reorganisation, such as the momentous reconstitution in 1904 of the War Office and the less important readjustment of the Air Ministry in 1938, as a result of the report of the Cadman Committee, should be brought before the Cabinet as a matter of loyalty, and the Cabinet has just ground for dissatisfaction if this rule is ignored. The rule is equally binding on the Premier himself, and it is patently unfair to his colleagues if he commits them without prior consultation, for he thus confronts them with the unpleasant alternatives of accepting action which they would not have approved, had they been permitted an option, or of having to resign office with their chief. Few instances of disregard of this obligation of honour are formally recorded. Lord John Russell (d), however, committed his Government to legislation against the assumption of territorial titles by the Roman Catholic hierarchy in 1850, so that they had to acquiesce in the passage of an Act, which proved quite useless, though it had royal approbation. Mr. Disraeli occasionally accepted amendments of substance without asking Cabinet accord, and Mr. Gladstone, in accepting a motion for a committee of enquiry on the negotiations with Mr. Parnell in 1882, disregarded a Cabinet decision; for which error he offered the excuse that he was carried away by a fit of temper (e). Much more important was the action of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, who deliberately threw overboard the elaborately safeguarded concessions to trade unions in the matter of legal liability worked out by his Government, and gave them the unwise immunity of the Act of 1906, and it was he who allowed domestic servants to be included in the scheme of workmen's compensation (f). Mr. Lloyd George, however, went further; his famous decision to summon an Imperial War Conference in 1916 was taken after consultation with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and announced to Parliament before it was reported by him to the War Cabinet, which had to make the best of the business by accepting a series of meetings of the War Cabinet, augmented by Dominion representatives (g). More important, probably, was Mr. Baldwin's decision in 1923 (h) to advocate protection without seeking a Cabinet sanction, and it seems clear that he forced the equalization of the sexes for the franchise on his Cabinet, because of a pledge which he had given in his election

(c) Dugdale, i. 428 ff., suggests that Mr. Balfour thought resignation was technically sound.

(d) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 34 ff.; Gooch, Russell, i. 46, 223 ff.; Jennings, Cabinet Government, p. 173.

(e) Gwynn, Dilke, i. 489.

(f) Spender, ii. 278, 280.

(g) Lloyd George, War Memoirs, iv. 1731—1735.

(h) Cf. Mallet, Care, pp. 264 f.

address, and which he had made without securing the approval of his colleagues (i).

It is clear from the last instance that the ex-Premier may in effect by pre-election declarations seriously affect the freedom of action of the ministry subsequently formed, and that these declarations may be made without the benefit of consultation with colleagues. Similarly, by statements in opposition, a leader may virtually bind himself and his party to a line of action which he has not submitted for the assent of his colleagues. Neither the disestablishment of the Irish Church nor the project of Home Rule for Ireland were submitted for approval by Mr. Gladstone to the ex-members of the Cabinet. With modern development of the idea of the ex-ministers forming a Shadow Cabinet when in opposition, there is, perhaps, less room for the taking by the ex-Prime Minister of an individual line of policy. What, however, is clear is that fairness and loyalty to colleagues do make it desirable that great political projects should be fully discussed with them all before responsibility therefor is assumed by the former Premier.

It is true that certain issues, despite their importance, cannot consistently be brought before the Cabinet, because matters are urgent. This point is especially applicable to foreign affairs, but the Cabinet is given the possibility of constant criticism by the rule of circulation of the important despatches, both in and out. The practice is of ancient lineage, and its propriety is beyond dispute, though there is much reason to fear that little use is made of the opportunity afforded, as when Lord Birkenhead accused Lord Curzon of failing to circulate a paper which he had actually read (k). It is, of course, no excuse for the failure of the minister to bring matters deliberately before his colleagues. We have seen Lord Palmerston's reluctance to discuss issues with the

(i) Joynson-Hicks was wrongly credited with the initiative. See Taylor, pp. 279 ff., who points out that Mr. Bonar Law had been in favour of equality.

(k) Nicolson, Curzon, p. 303.

Cabinet, as with the Queen and Premier, and Lord Salisbury was quite clear that business should be disposed of with the Queen and Prime Minister without Cabinet intervention, but he admitted in 1887, the necessity of discussion if members of the Cabinet noted any point of a telegram on the Bulgarian issue on which the Queen had strong personal views (l). Lord Rosebery offended Sir W. Harcourt (m) deeply, by marking as not to be printed for circulation a decision which extended British commitments in Uganda; the imperialistic character of his action naturally raised as much wrath as the modus operandi, which was declared to amount to a setting aside of the decision of the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. It is not, however, at all clear that so firm a view is justified. It is also doubtful if Sir W. Harcourt was just in reproaching Lord Rosebery, as Prime Minister, with refusing to call a Cabinet at his request, and that of the Foreign Secretary to discuss the issues between Britain and Nicaragua (n).

Much more serious is the accusation of Mr. Lloyd George (o) that from 1906 to 1914 there was a reticence and secrecy that shut out three-fourths of the Cabinet from the chance of making any genuine contribution to the discussion of foreign politics. The fact probably is that Sir E. Grey did not welcome incursions into the field of foreign politics by those who were not careful students of these issues, and throughout this period Mr. Lloyd George showed little comprehension of foreign issues, though on occasion he was quite willing to be used as an instrument for expressing in language more forthright than was desirable in a Foreign Secretary, the fact that Britain was determined not to be ignored in matters affecting vitally her interests, as in the question of the relations of France and Germany in 1911 (p). Of deliberate concealment

(l) Letters, 3 s., i. 211.

(m) Gardiner, ii. 315 f. Cf. Letters, 3 s., ii. 158 ff.

(n) Gardiner, Harcourt, ii. 331 f.; but see Crewe, Rosebery, ii. 450.

(o) War Memoirs, i. 46 ff.

(p) Mansion House speech, July 21st; Churchill, World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 43—50.

it seems impossible to talk, having regard to the circulation of papers, and Mr. George admits that questions were answered with civility if not encouraged. Ex post facto complaints which could have been made at the time and matters remedied are of little value. Nor is it possible to attach much faith to his allegation (q) that Sir H. Wilson, on the instigation of Sir D. Haig, misled the Cabinet in 1917 on the issues of the morale of the French army, and of the views of the French commanders regarding the Passchendaele plan. These and allied complaints are necessary parts of his endeavour to remove from himself and the War Cabinet, the grave reproach that they failed to provide Sir D. Haig with the reinforcements, for which he asked (r) and which were available, and thus brought upon Britain the losses and humiliation of the March. 1918, operations. It is clear that, if the Cabinet was not fully informed, that was its own fault, and that Sir D. Haig was guiltless of any suppression of truth. His persistence in the Passchendaele operations, after it would have been wiser in the weather conditions to break off, is patently open to disapproval (s), but that has nothing to do with the alleged failure to inform the Cabinet.

From the scope of Cabinet decisions certain matters are excluded by custom, for reasons of differing character and importance.

(1) One of these is the annual budget statement. This includes the proposals of new taxation, and accordingly it has been usual to restrict disclosure to the Cabinet to an oral statement made shortly before actual presentation. In 1936, despite the secrecy so carefully preserved, a tribunal of enquiry found that there had been disclosure by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Thomas, to another member of Parliament, Sir A. Butt, both of whom resigned from the Commons as the result (t). There are clear disadvantages in this procedure, (q) War Memoirs, iv. 2140 ff., 2191 ff.

(r) Duff Cooper, ii. 238, 286.

(t) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5184; Minutes of Enquiry.

(s) Duff Cooper, ii. 170 ff.

in so far as the Chancellor is allowed to prepare his plans without the valuable aid which is naturally provided by examination by a committee of the Cabinet, and these objections were shown to be very real in the case of Mr. N. Chamberlain's budget in 1937, when he proposed a tax on profits when increased by the expenditure of the country on rearmament. The result was that the scheme was vitally remodelled, after the new Chancellor, Sir J. Simon, who took the office on Mr. Chamberlain's appointment as Premier, had been allowed in an able speech (May 31st) to prove that it was both inherently admirable and very easily workable. Mr. Churchill, who himself when Chancellor, had had to sacrifice a petrol tax to popular clamour, pointed out that in the case of his much-abused betting tax, which Mr. Snowden stupidly dropped, it had been brought before the Cabinet a long time in advance and approved by it. In the case of estimates, on the other hand, the Cabinet is well accustomed to settling disputes, especially those raised by the demands of the defence departments. It was refusal of the Cabinet to practice economy which led to the disappearance of Lord R. Churchill (u), when in 1886 he forgot Goschen, and imagined himself indispensable, and in 1894, when a pusillanimous and divided ministry deserted Mr. Gladstone (x), only to postpone an inevitable fate for a brief period and, by a curious irony, to lose office because of a shortage in the cordite supply. A ministry which dispensed with Mr. Gladstone on the score of the necessity of security should surely have avoided so absurd an anti-climax.

(2) The Cabinet again does not normally consider issues of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy (y). It is felt that sound administration demands that the issue should be dealt with deliberately and in the fullest sense of final responsibility by the Home Secretary, and that any effort to weaken this responsibility is to be deprecated. This does not exclude occasional consideration of cases which raise questions of public feeling of unusual character. When Sir R. Casement was found guilty of treason by inciting Irish prisoners of war to join the German forces, there were various considerations affecting, inter alia, his mental condition, which rendered full Cabinet consideration desirable (z). There have been other cases in which it is believed that the Cabinet has been consulted. But the general principle is quite clear.

(u) Letters, 3 s., i. 229. Esher, Journals, i. 131.

(x) Morley, iii. 506 ff.

(y) In the Denshawi case in 1906 in Egypt, Sir E. Grey had only time to consult Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Asquith, and decided—wrongly—not to intervene: Twenty-five Years, i. 135—136.

(3) Similar considerations apply in general to criminal prosecutions which, so far as the State intervenes, are under the normal control of the Attorney-General, whose subordinate the Director of Public Prosecutions is. It is clearly desirable that these officers should proceed regularly with full personal responsibility. But it cannot be held that the Cabinet is precluded from decision, for instance, in respect of the policy of prosecution for sedition or incitement to mutiny. The necessity of upholding the law is plain, but the law of sedition is of venerable antiquity (a), and covers many acts which may be of minor importance, nor is it desirable to repress minor actions which may be capable of being held to be seditious. None-the-less it is undesirable that the Cabinet should intervene freely, for that is capable of being regarded as interference with the course of impartial justice (b). Lord Birkenhead, when Attorney-General, seems to have resented pressure as to prosecutions by the War Cabinet, while in the case of Sir G. Hewart instructions as to prosecutions for sedition were only given, because he asked the advice of the Home Secretary, which was clearly within his rights. Sir P. Hastings' action in the case of Mr. Campbell, in 1924, is less easy to judge. As the public saw the situation, after the Attorney-General had ordered a prosecution for incitement

(z) Bell, Randall Davidson, II. 786—789; Parmiter, 'asement. For release of Irish prisoners in 1882, Letters, 2 s., iii. 272 ff.

(a) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), pp. 182, 402 f.

(b) See the debate, 177 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 581—704.

to mutiny, as a result of questions in Parliament, the Prime Minister intervened, had the issue discussed by the Cabinet, and Sir P. Hastings then authorised the asking of the magistrate's leave to withdraw the prosecution. As the Government preferred to be defeated, rather than accept the way out in the form of an enquiry suggested by Mr. Asquith, the conclusion is difficult to avoid that its action would not have borne scrutiny, and that in fact there had been an improper interference with the course of justice, full knowledge of which would have exposed the Prime Minister and his colleagues to grave and just censure. This sinister episode played its part, in conjunction with the Zinovieff letter, in securing the complete defeat of the ministry at the general election which followed the defeat of the ministry in the Commons on this issue. The Cabinet was not invited to consider the question which arose, as the result of the enquiry into the budget case, of the propriety of the prosecution of the minister responsible for the leakage of information (c).

(4) Appointments do not normally come before the Cabinet, though there is no absolute rule. The Cabinet has been consulted from time to time as to the mode in which vacancies should be filled, though no doubt this sort of enquiry is best made privately. In the case of the Viceroy of India the question has on several occasions, according to Mr. Gladstone (d) and Mr. Asquith (e), been raised in the Cabinet; this post, of course, is of quite special importance. The employment of a member of the royal family as Governor-General is the kind of issue which might thus be dealt with (f).

(5) As regards honours, it is natural that the Cabinet should normally (g) be content to leave the matter to the Prime

(c) 313 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 39.

(d) Letters, 3 s., ii. 349 (under Palmerston, India); cf. Lord Lieutenant (1882), Letters, 2 s., iii. 271.

(e) Fifty Years of Parliament, ii. 194; it must have been Sir C. Hardinge versus Lord Kitchener; Lee, Edward VII, ii. 710 f. For Sir H. Robinson in South Africa, see Guedalla, ii. 109 (1880).

(f) Cf. discussions of work for the Prince of Wales to do: Guedalla, i. 351 ff.

(g) Curzon, House of Lords, March 7th, 1923.

Minister and the Crown. It would, in view of the frailty of Cabinet secrecy, be undesirable if such issues were freely debated in a large body. But the claim of Queen Victoria (h) that such discussions would be unconstitutional could not stand for a moment, and in respect to the Queen's desire to offer a dukedom to the Marquis of Lansdowne, Mr. Gladstone (i) explained that he felt he was fully entitled to consult the Cabinet, which was cognisant of that officer's services as Viceroy, but that he had refrained from doing so in the absence of the Secretary of State, and in deference to her views.

In the case of Mr. Sinha's appointment to the Council of the Governor-General the Cabinet was consulted, but for special reasons (k). The King objected to the principle of appointing to that Council any Indian, and only agreed to the appointment when the Cabinet unanimously advised that the appointment should be made as part of the reform scheme in India.

One case remains to be noted, because it exhibits very interestingly, the interaction of Queen Victoria and Lord Beaconsfield and the elasticity of Cabinet records. In May, 1879 (l), the project of sending Prince Albert Victor and Prince George of Wales for a six months' cruise in the Bacchante was approved by the Queen, but Mr. Smith, who learned of it, was afraid that, if anything happened to the princes when together, the Government would be held deeply to blame, and the Cabinet therefore urged that the proposed voyage should be confined to one prince. The Queen was very angry, and insisted that the matter should never have come before the Cabinet. Lord Beaconsfield was deeply apologetic, and excused himself on the score that the matter came up at the end of a long Cabinet, and that he had acted without due consideration, accepting full responsibility for

(h) Letters, 3 s., ii. 347.

(i) Letters, 3 s., ii. 349. Lord Kimberley objected to his chief's decision and let the Queen know.

(k) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 383—389.

(l) Letters, 2 s., iii. 22 f.

the error in lieu of Mr. Smith. He explained that he would withdraw the matter from the Cabinet, and, as there were no records of Cabinet Councils, would address a letter to the Lord President, assuming the whole responsibility.

2. The Doctrine of Collective Responsibility.

It is essential to the modern Cabinet system that responsibility should be collective. Matters are discussed in Cabinet, and a decision taken. It then becomes binding on every member of the Cabinet, and, of course, on every minister outside the Cabinet. He must vote for the Government's view if a vote is taken in Parliament, he must, if called upon, defend the decision, he must not excuse himself on the score that he was outvoted. If he does not consent to take responsibility, he must resign, as did Lord John Russell in 1855, Mr. Forster in 1882, the opponents of Home Rule in 1886, the free trade ministers in 1903, and again in 1932, and Lord Morley and Mr. Burns in 1914, because they could not approve of the decision to go to war.

The theory is clear, but in practice there are relaxations. The most obvious is to leave certain issues open questions, and this may be the only way to have an effective ministry for the time being, leaving matters to ripen to a decision. The early history of the corn laws is the classic instance; the ministry of 1831—34 treated it as an open question, and as late as 1841 Lord Melbourne was bitterly opposed to sweeping away protection, while his colleagues in the Commons were strongly in favour. In 1873 the extension of the country franchise was left open, and in 1905 a weak Cabinet could not decide on army reform, and the rather absurd spectacle (m) was afforded of the War Minister presenting his own ideas as such to the Commons. Clearly on matters of this kind, divided counsels are injurious to any Government. It was rather different in the case of female suffrage, which cut across party divisions. The Governments of Mr. Asquith (n) and Mr. Lloyd George were willing to leave it open for the moment, but the issue was settled in 1918, and, whatever the views of some of his colleagues may have been, Mr. Baldwin decided to extend it completely in 1928 (o).

(m) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 205.

After the fall of the Labour ministry in 1931 an appeal to the people was decided upon, and in default of agreement it was based on asking for authority to adopt such methods as might seem necessary to restore the position. The Conservative plea for a request for a mandate for protection was laid aside, as the coalition included a substantial body of Liberal, though a bare handful of Labour supporters. The election over, a Cabinet Committee concluded in favour of protection, with the result that the Liberal ministers felt under a clear obligation to resign. At the urgent request of the Prime Minister, who realised that, if they did so, the absurdity of his position would be patent, they refrained from this action on the basis of an understanding, suggested by Lord Hailsham, "that some modification of usual ministerial procedure is required," and "that ministers who find themselves unable to support the conclusions arrived at by the majority of their colleagues on the subject of import duties and cognate matters are to be at liberty to express their views by speech and vote" (p). The position was anomalous and was ended in less than eight months by the resignation of the ministers in question in view of the Ottawa agreements, which they criticised as fixing a system of imperial preference on the country, which would tend to render difficult the extension of external trade generally, and would hamper the essential purpose of appeasement in economic issues in Europe. With their resignation the only justification for the Prime Minister's clinging to office vanished, for the Liberals who remained, were Liberals in name only, and dependent wholly on Conservative votes.

(n) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 358 ff.

(o) Prayer Book revision stood on a different footing, as it came from the Church Assembly.

(p) See Snowden, Autobiography, ii. 1010; and cf. Lord Hailsham, 83 H. L. Deb. 5 s., 551 f.

The failure of the experiment was really inevitable. The essence of Cabinet government is the party system, and the existence of parties divided by principles. Ministers may differ on minor issues without serious disadvantage, and accept majority decisions thereon with propriety, but a ministry made up of men without common principles, held together by little more than the desire for office, would speedily lack power and cohesion. The Conservatives lost nothing by the departure from the ministry of men who did not believe in its fundamental principle, while their continued presence in the ministry weakened their own party.

The principle of collective responsibility involves that a Cabinet minister must vote with the party, if he is not paired or if he is not unavoidably absent when any important vote is taken. Sir C. Dilke (q) in 1883 was reproved by Lord Hartington for failure to vote against a female suffrage amendment to the Reform Bill, but was not actually asked to resign, the matter being of minor importance. On the other hand the duty of refraining from any declaration of policy, contrary to that accepted by the Government, is clear. Lord Palmerston impressed on Mr. Gladstone the necessity of compliance with this principle, and in the course of time Mr. Gladstone repeated it to his colleagues (r). Queen Victoria was sadly vexed at the lengths to which Mr. Chamberlain went under Mr. Gladstone, who was driven to the admission (s) that he had power to call his ministers to book if they spoke unadvisedly on matters affecting duty to the Crown, or attempted to commit their colleagues. But Mr. Chamberlain found an easy way out. With Sir C. Dilke he devised the doctrine that for ministers to use public platforms to expound their ideals of future policy was in true accord with modern democracy, and did not offend against official propriety (t). When in alliance with the Conservatives, but disappointed of the succession to the Premiership, he adopted a like licence of public propaganda, thus creating a position of much embarrassment to Mr. Balfour, which ended only with Mr. Chamberlain's resignation in order to obtain the fullest freedom to air his propositions (u). On the other hand, when Mr. Lloyd George made his famous speech in 1911 (x), he had the authority of both Mr. Asquith and Sir E. Grey, and was merely declaring a principle, which was self-evident, though his choice of language was well adapted to give special weight to his announcement. It was quite different, when in 1916 he advocated in an interview the policy of the Knock-out Blow without the assent of the Foreign Secretary (y). Sir E. Grey had earlier had occasion to instruct both Mr. Churchill and Mr. Lloyd George regarding the obligations of moderation of language in dealing with foreign affairs (z). But Mr. Joynson-Hicks' action in 1927 on a private member's bill in announcing the intention of the Government to concede equal suffrage was clearly an expression of the decision of the Prime Minister (a), who was beside him, and as has been seen, the Prime Minister is apt to claim for himself a freedom of speech on issues not yet settled by the Cabinet, which is justified by the fact that it is normally impossible for his colleagues to do anything except homologate his action with such good grace as is proper.

(q) Gwynn, ii. 9.

(s) Letters, 2 s., m. 433 ft.; 526 ft., Guedalla, ii. 292.

(r) Morley, iii. 113 f.

Some obscurity attends the indiscretion, probably calculated, by which Mr. N. Chamberlain denounced the continuation of sanctions on June 10th, 1936, as midsummer madness. The Cabinet had not then apparently adopted this policy, but the Prime Minister, when challenged on June 11th, in part explained that the Chancellor had spoken at a private meeting, in part welcomed his expression of opinion as a matter for serious consideration. The collapse of British resistance to Italy was announced thereafter by Mr. Eden at Geneva, and

(t) Garvin, Chamberlain, i. 559 ff.

(x) See p. 114, ante.

(z) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 655.

(u) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 173 ff.

(y) War Memoirs, ii. 856 f.

(a) Taylor, Brentford, pp. 279 ff.

the long chapter of British surrenders, leading to the annexation of Austria to Germany on February 13th, 1938, was opened. For this, of course, Mr. Eden shared full responsibility.

On February 20th, 1938, however, Mr. Eden's resignation was announced, and Lord Cranborne, his Under-Secretary, followed suit. It was made clear by Mr. Eden in the House on February 21st, and in a speech to his constituents on February 25th, confirmed by Lord Cranborne on February 26th, that they resigned, because the terms of the Italian demand for discussions amounted to a choice of "now or never," or, as Lord Cranborne frankly said, to an ultimatum. Mr. Eden, however, made it clear that he was not merely opposed to the time of negotiation, but to the substance of the Prime Minister's outlook. Mr. Chamberlain's efforts on February 21st, 22nd, and April 4th, to disprove this assertion, were unconvincing, as was his effort to show his adherence to the policy, which won the general election of 1935, and the recognition of the humiliation of Britain, and of her self-confessed weakness was seen in the action of Herr Hitler towards Austria, and Czechoslovakia.

The rules which apply to Cabinet ministers are not quite so absolute as regards minor ministers, though even in their case they are probably now more stringent than in Mr. Gladstone's time. He had to explain away successively the failure of Mr. Bright, Sir C. Dilke and Mr. J. Chamberlain to vote for the motion in favour of the erection of a statute to Lord Beaconsfield in 1881 (b); Sir C. Dilke's refusal to vote for the annuity to Prince Leopold on his marriage (c); and his failure and that of two minor ministers, Mr. Fawcett and Mr. L. Courtney, to oppose the amendment in favour of female suffrage above referred to. It is dubious if such independence would now be displayed, so strict are the rules of party loyalty, and so active the whips. A speech on March 18th, 1938, pledging the Prime Minister to refuse any guarantee to Czechoslovakia, by Mr. Lennox-Boyd, was severely attacked in the Commons on March 21st, and its folly admitted by its author, who had just received ministerial rank.

(b) Guedalla, ii. 156.

(c) Guedalla, ii. 183—185. Mr. Fawcett also refrained.

It must be remembered that in private members' bills there is normally no compulsion as to voting, though it is now expected, it seems, that ministers will seldom actually vote against a Bill which is blessed by the minister whose department covers the subject-matter of the Bill, as in the case of the Caledonian Power Bill of 1937, but in 1938 this rule was not kept.

Like treatment was accorded to the Church Measure enacting the revised form of the English Prayer Book when brought forward in 1927 and 1928. The ministry were divided in opinion, and the coup de grâce was administered by the Home Secretary, despite the unpopularity of his stand for the maintenance of the religion of the Church of England against the encroachment of doctrines of Papistic tendency foreign to the Reformation settlement.

Collective responsibility would be impossible if it were not that the members of the Cabinet from the circumstances of their selection are men naturally of like mind on essential issues, and therefore divergences on fundamentals are comparatively rare. There may be differences on tactics; men who agree on the merits in abstracto of a line of action may honestly disagree as to the party wisdom of presenting this as their policy to the electorate. But even more difficult is the case when a Cabinet is asked to decide in time of war on the advice of rival experts. It makes little fundamental difference whether the Cabinet is large or small in such cases. There is no reliable evidence to show that the War Cabinet of Mr. Lloyd George operated more successfully in judging the steps to be taken, than the larger body presided over by Mr. Asquith. Ability counts, and the members excluded by Mr. Lloyd George were of an intellectual calibre, superior to that of his chosen co-adjutors.

The Cabinet normally, it is clear, arrives at unanimity much as does a village panchayat in India. Views are discussed, differences smoothed out, and a compromise result achieved, which all can accept without dishonour. Where it is impossible thus to agree, voting is possible. For some obscure reason there seems reluctance to admit the fact that votes are quite normally taken when requisite. Lord Granville (d) did not like the practice, but Mr. Gladstone carried the decision to arrest Mr. Dillon by his casting vote, and the issue of the removal of the statute of the Great Duke from Hyde Park Corner was decided in 1883 by a show of hands. The Education Bill of 1901 was the subject of several divisions, and according to Mr. Churchill the naval estimates of 1913, which excited an acute division of opinion, were the subject of discussion at fourteen Cabinet meetings until the decision was reached. Overruling of the view of the Prime Minister is not unknown. Lord Salisbury seems to have quite cheerfully acquiesced in defeats (e), and Mr. Bonar Law allowed himself to be voted down on the issue of accepting the damnosa hereditas of Mr. Baldwin's settlement of the American debt (f). With this we may contrast the vehemence with which Mr. Disraeli wrestled with the various views of his small Cabinet, in which at one time there were seven divergent opinions (g), and later he insisted on securing the acquiescence of the Cabinet in the desire of his Colonial Secretary to retain Sir Bartle Frere in the Cape (h). Mr. Gladstone's resignation followed his finding himself in a minority on the issue of defence estimates.

It is easy enough to understand that, even when there is voting, those defeated do not resign. The issues are usually (d) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 5, cf. Oxford, Fifty Years of Parliament, ii. 196; Jennings, Cabinet Government, pp. 202 f.

(e) In 1890, he was angry and only yielded to the Commons' members' view that the resolutions on procedure could not go on because he did not want to dissolve: Letters, s. 3, i. 618 f. He and the Queen disliked greatly the dropping of the Education Bill, 1896: Letters, 3 v., iii. 54—56.

(f) Taylor, Bonar Law, pp. 270 ff.

(g) Monypenny and Buckle, ii. 1066.

(h) Lady V. Hicks-Beach, Hicks-Beach, i. 130.

on points not of essential importance to most of those who vote, and resignation is an ultima ratio. Will it be possible to secure success thereafter? Lord R. Churchill's fate remains a warning, though Mr. Churchill, until 1929, seemed to suggest that political skill might enable a man to change his principles, with no loss of profit, if some of reputation. Lord John Russell in 1855 deserted his colleagues on Mr. Roebuck's motion regarding the conduct of the war, and only ten years later on the death of Lord Palmerston did the veteran secure a brief tenure of the Premiership. Lord Derby, disgusted with the foreign policy of Mr. Disraeli, found a welcome in the ranks of the Liberals, and the Liberals who deserted the leader on Home Rule gradually formed a firm alliance with the Conservatives. Mr. Addison resigned in 1921, because he found that the Cabinet had not kept faith with him as regards the housing policy he had been instructed to promote, and his future proved to lie with the Labour party. Mr. Eden's dramatic resignation in 1938 was accompanied by declarations by many Conservatives, including Lord Halifax, that they hoped to see him again in office, and the ex-minister was punctilious in embarrassing as little as possible the Government, to whose principles he asserted in general his firm adherence. The impression in such a case is that the minister looks forward at some later, but not distant date, when the immediate issue is disposed of, to re-employment, and the expectation is the more natural when the advanced age of the Premier plainly renders it inevitable that a prolonged tenure of office, at a time when the leaders of the Fascist states are full of vigour and power, must run counter to the public advantage.

An interesting light on the process of Cabinet adjustment is thrown by Lord Grey. The difference of opinion is first set out and stoutly maintained in Cabinet. If the conflict is so severe as to suggest resignations, individual ministers of divergent views may undertake private talks with one another outside the Cabinet. In this way the strength of conflicting contentions is tested, and the amount of concession each person can make is ascertained. Finally, the Cabinet again meets with the knowledge that it is going to agree on some solution. This, however, presupposes that the difference of opinion is really about the merits of the question and is not a pretext put forward for a personal or political object; in such cases the procedure is much less pleasant and the prognosis less favourable. This summary shed some light on the manner in which it proved possible to adjust the famous controversy over four, six or eight dreadnoughts, and the regular annual dispute over the military estimates (k).

That the Cabinet may most efficiently reach Cabinet decisions of the kind mentioned, it is clearly desirable that its members should have the character of good colleagues. The characteristics demanded by Lord Grey are clearly of universal application. Members should work heartily for Cabinet decisions, should not press personal views unduly on matters not essential, should contend for substance, not form, and each should consider without amour propre how his own opinion can be reconciled with that of others. Subject to the qualification of not sacrificing what he regards as essential to the public interest, he should not contend for victory, but work for agreement in the Cabinet. Secondly, when a Cabinet decision is attained, he should accept full responsibility for it. Thirdly, resignation should never be talked about or threatened except on a matter of vital importance, and then only when resignation is really intended (l).

3. Coalition Governments.

It follows from these facts that a coalition government is essentially anomalous in Britain, because it contradicts the fundamental principle that a Cabinet represents a party united in principle. The comparatively rarity of coalitions is due to this inherent difficulty, and the operations of the coalition of (k) Twenty-five Years, i, 200 f.

(l) Ibid. i, 67 f.

1852—55 have normally been judged by the effect. The ministry was one of many talents, but their minds worked in very different ways, as might be expected from all that is known of the Premier, of Lord John Russell, and of Lord Clarendon. The evidence suggests that the result was a series of compromises which gave effect neither to the views of those who desired to maintain the peace, nor to those who thought an active offensive would serve best British interest, and the country blundered ultimately into a war whence no great profit could be expected and the minimum advantage was derived. Mr. Gladstone, indeed, and the Duke of Argyll can be cited for their admiration of the smooth working of the ministry, but it must have been the smoothness which is produced by sedulous avoidance of realities (m).

No other coalition occurred until 1915, for Lord Salisbury and the Conservatives absorbed the Liberal Unionists, who soon became imbued with most of their principles. The coalition of 1915 must be regarded as having wrought more injury than good; whatever chance there might have been of saving the situation at the Dardanelles was lost (n) while the new ministers were adjusting themselves to their colleagues, and the effort was being made to weld into a unity men whose chief concern was the question of the reception which their party would give to the decisions taken. All chance of rapid and clear-cut decisions was gone, and it is impossible to disagree with Mr. Churchill, himself a paris mali, that it would have conducted far more to the welfare of the nation, which both parties professed sole anxiety to further, if one or other had yielded place and allowed a definite policy to be pursued without the delays and doubts occurring to many able minds (o). It is quite easy to believe that the vital change of the creation of the War Cabinet had the merit of lessening the disadvantage of the existence of Liberal and Conservative points of view. The close of the war and the re-introduction of the normal Cabinet system saw little of a true coalition left, for the coupon election had banished as outcasts all those Liberals who had the temerity to ask for enquiry into the error by which Mr. Lloyd George wholly misstated (p) the strength of the forces in France at the time when the German offensive pierced lines which could not be held in sufficient strength through the Premier's refusal to send Sir D. Haig the necessary reinforcements.

(m) Cf. Bell, Palmerston, ii. 61—105; Puryear, England, Russia and the Straits Question (1932); Camb. Hist. Brit. For. Policy, ii. 340—376.

(n) World Crisis, 1915, pp. 393 f. (three weeks delay). For the conscription deadlock, see Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 208 ff.

(o) World Crisis, 1915, p. 477. Cf. Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 211.

The coalition of 1931 had in its initiation the character of a coalition between Conservatives and Liberals with a few Labour representatives. It had no moral right to the style National, but the same remark applies to most governments whether in the Empire or the Dominions which adopt that pleasing style. From the retirement of the Liberal ministers in 1932 and their subsequent passing into formal opposition, the element of coalition disappeared, for the ministers who claimed rank as Nationals of Liberal type differed in nothing from their Conservative colleagues, and the National Labour representatives clearly were without any right to bear that title. The result was doubtless inevitable. The country cannot be governed effectively without clear party divisions and a National Government might, if seriously constructed, well prove fatal to the maintenance of individual liberty.

4. The Procedure of the Cabinet.

It is clear that in the earlier days of the Cabinet a simple procedure (q) sufficed. The Premier was informed by his colleagues of any points which they desired to raise, and any minister who so desired could order the circulation to the Cabinet of a memorandum setting forth his views. Naturally,

(p) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 303 ff. For Haig's correction of a misstatement by Mr. Bonar Law regarding his taking over further responsibility for the line, see Duff Cooper, ii. 286.

(q) Its genesis can be interestingly traced in Turner, Cabinet Council, 1622—1784, ii. 101 ff., 304 ff.

any member who received such a memorandum could circulate a counter-memorandum, as did Lord Balfour and Mr. Ritchie when Mr. Balfour circulated his meditations on possible modification of the free trade system in 1903. The meeting was summoned in the name of the Prime Minister by his secretary, normally once a week. The Prime Minister controlled the proceedings; the Foreign Secretary made his observations on any important incidents and answered, politely, as Mr. Lloyd George admits, questions arising thence or out of the Foreign Office (r) papers which had been circulated. Then the Premier allowed the several ministers to put their questions before the Cabinet, guided the discussion to some final or provisional conclusion, recorded the result and then called on another minister to open his subject and so on. There was neither Secretariat or record other than the letter from the Premier to the King, a copy of which was kept by the Premier's private secretary. Much play has been made with the informal character of the procedure, and Mr. Asquith has been accused of special carelessness in recording decisions, but there is abundant evidence of doubts arising earlier. The occasions have all the same characteristic. They were due to long and confused discussions ended rather by passage to another topic than by a definite result, as was natural in the muddled deliberations in the ministry in 1876—78 on the Russo-Turkish issue (s). In the next ministry we have the amusing anecdote of the inability of Sir W. Harcourt and Mr. J. Chamberlain to agree as to what happened at the Cabinet of the day before. "There must have been some decision," wrote Lord Hartington's private secretary to Mr. Gladstone's, "as Bright's resignation shows. My chief has told me to ask you what the devil was decided, for he be damned if he knows. Will you ask Mr. G. in more conventional and less pungent terms ? ” (t). Lord Lansdowne complained when he was called to account for his publication of the Spion Kop dispatches, which annoyed the Queen very greatly (u), that Cabinet decisions were not always very distinctly intimated to those who had to carry them out, and Lord Salisbury with his usual insouciance doubted whether the traditional practice of not recording decisions was a wise one. It is, of course, plain that it was his duty to have recorded the result definitely, in which case the mistake could not easily have occurred. Still, no doubt it was easy enough for ministers to carry away wrong impressions if the decision was not precisely summed up by their chief, for the taking of notes was distinctly banned by men so different as Mr. Asquith and Lord Salisbury. One may sympathise with Lord Derby’s claim to be entitled to take notes in Lord Beaconsfield’s Cabinet on the understanding that they would later be destroyed (x).

(r) Cf. Lord Salisbury's practice: Letters, 3 s., i. 211, where he held a special Cabinet arising out of dissent to a telegram on the Bulgarian issue duly circulated.

(s) Monypenny and Buckle, Disraeli, ii. 967, 1070, 1145 ff.; Jennings, Cabinet Government, ii. 210 ff.

At the same time the Cabinet on occasion could put its advice in the form of minutes. This was done by the Grenville Ministry in 1807; as regards the creation of peers in 1832, and the precedent was followed in 1910, as regards the promise to the King that advice as to the creation of peers would not be tendered until the occasion arose, and the later request for an undertaking from the Crown to create peers in certain circumstances (y). Queen Victoria in like manner had insisted on a formal minute before she exercised her powers under the Act of 1809 of revoking the warrant permitting the purchase of army commissions (z). As the Lords had refused to accept legislation to this end, her insistence on formal procedure was clearly right. A formal minute was drawn up regarding the acquisition of a naval base in the Mediterranean in 1878 (a).

(t) Cited 86 H. L. Deb. 5 s., 529. For Mr. Balfour’s Cabinet’s misunderstanding on tariff policy, 1902, see Dugdale, i. 339 ff.

(u) Letters, 3 s., iii. 533, 536, 538, 541.

(x) Cf. Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 120 ff.

(y) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 273, 296 f. (z) Letters, 2 s., ii. 152 ff.

(a) Monypenny and Buckle, Disraeli, ii. 1018.

The outbreak of war unquestionably necessitated a more effective system, and it was found ready to hand in the Secretariat of the Committee of Imperial Defence, which had been created in very modest form in 1903. The secretariat was augmented under the Liberal regime (b), and was given the duty of framing the agenda, taking minutes, both of plenary committee meetings and of the ever-growing number of sub-committees, and of communicating the findings to the departments concerned. In special, through the activities of the secretariat, proper arrangements were made for the preparation and dissemination to the numerous authorities concerned in the United Kingdom and overseas of the war book, which was relied upon for guidance in the early days of the Great War. The War Council set up in November, 1914 (c), naturally used the secretariat, as did the Dardanelles Committee (d) and the War Committee into which it grew (e). Hence, in 1916, when the War Cabinet was created by Mr. Lloyd George, it naturally took over the secretariat, and after the war the system continued (f). The Cabinet secretariat was presided over by Sir M. Hankey who was also Secretary to the Committee of Imperial Defence, when revived in full form, and Clerk of the Privy Council. Obviously the combination of posts was largely personal, but the advantages of having one secretary for the Cabinet and the Committee of Imperial Defence renders that aspect of position in principle desirable. The Cabinet secretariat was vastly expanded during the war, and, as we have seen, rivalled at times the Foreign Office; under Mr. Bonar Law its abolition was mooted,

(b) For Sir. H. Campbell-Bannerman's acceptance of it, see Esher, Journals, ii. 128. Cf. 114 ff.

(c) It included Mr. Balfour by an interesting innovation: Dugdale, ii. 125 ff.

(d) Formed June, 1915; for its demerits, see Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 190 ff.

(e) November, 1915; Mr. Churchill was excluded: World Crisis, 1915, pp. 495 ff.

(f) See Parl. Pap., Cd. 9230, p. 6 for the approval of the Machinery of Government Committee. See also Cd. 9085; Cmd. 325; 155 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 223, 265.

but wisely all that was done was to reduce it to due dimensions and to define and limit its functions. It serves now to compile the agenda for meetings of the Cabinet and its committees, under the direction of the Premier or the chairman; to circulate the memoranda and other documents requisite for discussion; to issue summonses to meetings; to record and circulate to ministers the conclusions arrived at by the Cabinet or its committees, and to draw up the reports of such committees; and to keep the Cabinet papers and conclusions. The war-time practice of recording the discussions of issues is now abandoned; there is recorded in lieu the substance of documents submitted or statements made, the general character of the arguments, and the conclusions reached. The secretariat no longer informs the departments of decisions affecting them; each Cabinet minister receives a copy, and non-Cabinet ministers receive, on the authority of the Premier, extracts of conclusions on matters affecting their departments. It lies with the minister to carry out the decision fully and loyally if something unexpected has turned up; he can, of course, refer for guidance to the Prime Minister, but alteration without authority can be excused only by such urgency as exists in war, and must be reported to Prime Minister and Cabinet. A copy of the minutes goes, of course, to the King. This procedure, it is clear, eliminates undesirable intervention of the Cabinet Office, but it is plain that in the war period, its activities bordered on the mischievous, though the Prime Minister's own secretariat was a prime offender.

It rests with the Prime Minister to decide on the calling of Cabinets; a weekly meeting may in emergency be supplemented, while during the holiday season, after Parliament has risen, as few Cabinets as possible are summoned. Normally the Premier will defer to any request by a Cabinet minister for a meeting, but Mr. Balfour insisted on delaying a Cabinet on fiscal issues (g), pending the return of Mr. J. Chamberlain from Africa to England. On the other hand, orderly consideration of matters to be dealt with is furthered by rules of modern application. It is provided that draft Bills shall not be circulated until the law officers have had a chance of expressing their views, that matters affecting more than one department should be submitted only after discussion, and in special, since 1919 (h), that issues affecting finance shall not be circulated until the sanction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been obtained, which means, it is presumed, that the matter must be held over to permit the preparation of a financial memorandum. Not until the Premier is satisfied that these principles have been observed, or can be waived, is circulation of documents permitted. If the papers affect departments not represented in the Cabinet, the documents may, by permission of the Premier, or the minister who supplies them, be sent to the ministerial heads. Items of business usually appear on the agenda not earlier than five days after circulation, to allow of full consideration and preparation and circulation of counter memoranda. It is clearly desirable that the issues should be as fully defined in the papers submitted, which normally become permanent records in the Cabinet Office. The Premier decides the order of the items on the agenda, which includes, as in pre-war days, a statement by the Foreign Secretary on which questions can be asked, and it is communicated to ministers, who thus reach the Cabinet fully prepared, if they have taken the trouble to master the documents supplied (i), to engage in rapid discussion and decision.

(g) Dugdale, i. 341. Cf. Mr. Chamberlain's successful request for a Cabinet: Garvin, iii. 461 (September 18th, 1899).

The changes referred to have simplified Cabinet discussions by helping to eliminate issues which can be disposed of by inter-departmental discussions, if necessary with the arbitration of the Premier; by ensuring that discussion takes place on definite issues; and by securing that the financial implications of each proposal are clearly set out. The practice of referring matters to committees saves discussion of issues not yet ripe for settlement, and defence questions are dealt with in the Committee of Imperial Defence so carefully that the Cabinet need do little but homologate. Bills normally have been carefully considered by the law officers, while the Home Affairs Committee deals with issues of priority. Moreover, matters are sometimes dealt with before the Cabinet discussion by individual ministers (k), who can present their colleagues with an agreement which the others will not care to attack.

(h) Heath, The Treasury, pp. 58 f.

(i) Often they do not: Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 348.

Cabinets, no doubt, may be overworked, though that is not normally the case, unless in time of war, as in 1914—19, or of financial strain, as in 1930—32, or of international unrest on a grandiose scale, as since the Italian aggression on Ethiopia in 1935, which opened the way to the re-occupation by German military forces of the Rhineland, the civil war in Spain, the annexation of Austria to Germany, and other evils inseparably bound up with the destruction by French action in respect of Ethiopia of the power of the League of Nations to preserve collective security. The incident of the Hoare-Laval terms in December, 1935, is an example where undue haste allowed the Cabinet to homologate a policy ruinous to the status of the League, and the surrender of Mr. Chamberlain to the Italian ultimatum on negotiations on February 20th, 1938, suggests strong failure on the part of the Cabinet to deal adequately with grave issues on the score of the excessive burden of urgent problems.

Especially when the Cabinet is overburdened, it is natural that the leading ministers should take to the practice of settling issues, as far as possible, by consultations inter se in anticipation of, or even in substitution for, full examination by the whole Cabinet. This will happen, even if there is no extreme pressure of work, if, as is normal, the Cabinet is composed in part of very mediocre politicians, leavened by a few men marked out by ability, or force of personality, or long experience and mature judgment, or some share of these qualifications. In 1878 the issue was complicated by the disagreement between Lord Beaconsfield and his Foreign Secretary. Hence, in regard to the measures to be taken to safeguard Constantinople the Prime Minister, Lord Salisbury, and the weighty Lord Cairns constituted themselves an informal committee, which determined on a policy likely to please the Queen, and then presented it to the Cabinet, in which naturally they bore down the resistance of Lord Derby and secured Cabinet approval for the telegrams to be sent to British representatives from the Foreign Office (l). It is not surprising that Lord Derby resigned. In 1898 when Sir A. Milner, wholly under estimating the power of resistance of the Boers, proposed a policy contemplating as a possibility actual war (m), Mr. J. Chamberlain communicated it only to Mr. Balfour, then acting Prime Minister, the Duke of Devonshire, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the heads of the Admiralty and the War Office, and his reply was sent without consultation of the Cabinet (n). In a similar spirit Mr. Balfour was in close touch with Mr. Chamberlain over the conduct of foreign affairs (o). In 1914 the Foreign Secretary (p) and Prime Minister acted as regards the German bid for British neutrality in anticipation of Cabinet sanction. The interesting decision to attempt to save Antwerp by the despatch thither of the naval brigade was taken by Lord Kitchener, Mr. Churchill, the moving spirit, and Sir E. Grey, the Prime Minister not at the moment being immediately available (q). At the dangerous moment after the retreat from Mons, when it seemed as if Sir J. French might retire beyond the Seine,

(k) Cf. the older usage under which matters were matured for decision by a full Cabinet in a meeting to which not all were not summoned: Lord Cranbrook, 185 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 1348.

(l) Lady G. Cecil, Salisbury, ii. 209.

(m) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 364 f. This letter showed Lord Milner determined to bring on war.

(n) Ibid. 366—368. He wisely insisted on the pursuit of peace.

(o) Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, i. 266—272.

(p) Twenty-five Years, i. 325 ff.

(q) Churchill, World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 338 ff.

the decision to send Lord Kitchener to give him Cabinet instructions to the contrary, was taken by some ministers, whose action, of course, received Cabinet endorsement (r). The further development of the doctrine held by Mr. Lloyd George that super-men are needed to act in a crisis was his creation of the famous War Cabinet (s). But Mr. Lloyd George's conception of an inner ring was shared by the Labour ministries; Lord Snowden (t) definitely tells us that in the second ministry of Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Thomas, who had, as Lord Privy Seal, in theory the duty of devising a solution of the Labour question, Mr. Snowden, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the retiring Mr. Clynes, then Home Secretary, and closely in touch with the party, used to meet weekly for a general conversation on the state of the party and parliamentary business. Three of these men shared in the formation of the National Government and the destruction of the Labour ministry, which they had landed in complete disaster, so that the case is not a very good example of the value of inner Cabinets, if the members thereof forget the mentality of the rank and file.

(It is clear that this idea of an inner Cabinet is not without dangers. It is not easy for members of the Cabinet to accept the pre-eminence of a few out of their number. They must all agree that the Prime Minister stands in a place of his own; there is probably sometimes agreement as to the member of the Cabinet on whom his mantle must fall, if for any reason he is anxious to leave office. But beyond that opinions will differ, and more resentment than profit will result from any effort to make the Cabinet feel that it meets only in matters of high importance to ratify decisions arrived at by an inner group, self constituted. There is a much more satisfactory and regular mode of aiding the Cabinet to decide, the regular committee system.)

(r) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 107—109, 125. Sir J. French's indignation at Lord Kitchener's appearance in uniform was ridiculous: Churchill, World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 277 ff.

(s) Mr. Balfour in 1915 thought the Cabinet with prior consultations among certain members would be better than a War Committee: Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 187.

(t) Autobiography, ii. 924 f.

5. The Committee of Imperial Defence.

Of these committees that on imperial defence is the most important. It is essentially a production of the present century, though it had a faint precursor in the naval and military committee of the Cabinet created by Lord Salisbury under Lord Hartington in 1890, who had in 1888 undertaken the work of presiding over a Commission on the War Office (u). But the committee had no effective existence until it was reconstituted in December, 1902, by authority of Mr. Balfour, while in 1904, as a result of the advice of the most important committee on the re-organisation of the War Office, it was made a permanent body, as the Committee of Imperial Defence, with a permanent secretariat (x). Mr. Balfour desired elasticity in its composition, and thus the Prime Minister was held to be the only permanent member of the body, but naturally the essential ministers were regularly summoned, at that time the Lord President, the Secretary of State for War, the First Lord and the First Sea Lord of the Admiralty, and the Commander-in-Chief, with the heads of the Naval and Military Intelligence Departments as joint secretaries, and a Foreign Office clerk to keep the minutes. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, on mature consideration, approved the idea, and expanded the activities of the committee. Sub-committees became important and numerous, the Overseas Defence Committee, the Home Ports Defence Committee, and so on. Mr. Asquith added a standing sub-committee representing all departments likely to be concerned in the event of the outbreak of war, while, in accord with the (u) Parl. Pap. C. 5979, p. viii. See Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 148 f.; ii. 185, 245 ff.; Hankey, Army Quarterly, 1927, pp. 254 ff.; Esher, Journals, ii. 34 ff.; Dugdale, Balfour, i. 364 ff.

(x) Cf. 108 Parl. Deb. 4 s., 291; 8 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1381 ff.; Lord Haldane (1926) in Keith, Speeches and Documents on the British Dominions, 1918—31, pp. 372—379.

conversations with French representatives consequent on the entente of 1904, plans were matured for the despatch in case of need to France of an expeditionary corps. Moreover, as we have seen, the committee was responsible for the famous war book, which proved invaluable in the crisis, for naturally there was no other source available envisaging the innumerable points which had at once to receive attention, not merely in Britain, but in each Dominion and colony. It was at a meeting of the committee, as opposed to the Imperial Conference (y), that in 1911 the Prime Ministers of the Dominions were given full information for the first time of the whole character of British foreign policy, and of the defence issues therewith bound up. It is clear that through the committee the inner Cabinet obtained a very real, but duly authorised existence, for the ministers engaged in defence and foreign affairs were necessarily deeply concerned with the issues then of greatest importance to the future of the country. It is hardly likely, however, that from their association with military and naval authorities, professionally keen to test in practice their plans, and prepared to use the opposition to put pressure on the Government, the ministers who served on the committee imbibed any eagerness to go to war. That was imposed upon them by the logic of events and the feeling of the country, especially when the violation of the neutrality of Belgium became known. Moreover, ministers were too deeply immersed in the affairs of the internal administration of the country, and above all, the Irish problem, to have any desire to be plunged into hostilities. But they should be given some credit for their readiness to consider the plans of the technical experts summoned to the meetings, which resulted in Britain being far better prepared for war than any one would have expected (z). The despatch of four divisions to France, on the one hand, and the hasty carrying through Parliament of the Defence of the Realm Act, and other measures for meeting the difficulties immediately created by the declaration of war, attested the completeness of the foresight displayed by the committee.

(y) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions, ii. 874 f.

(z) Asquith, The Genesis of the War, ch. xiv—xvii.; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 62 f. For the inner Cabinet, see Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 539 (Samuel and Runciman critical); for the effective working in August, 1914, ibid. 560 ff.

The outbreak of war caused the committee to be transformed in November formally to a War Council, and it was only after peace was restored that the committee began to revert to type. The idea that there should be effective co-ordination of the services under a Minister of Defence had naturally gained strength from the allegations that there had been defective co-operation in the war between the different arms, and from the embittered controversy which had raged regarding the control of the Air Force, which had gradually succeeded in acquiring its status as a distinct arm. Plainly, to place both the army and the Air Force under one Secretary of State, as in 1921, when Mr. Churchill was in charge, was inadequate, and the Committee on National Expenditure of Sir E. Geddes declared in favour of the plan of a single ministry, with subordinate ministers not in the Cabinet. This much discussed plan raised so many difficulties that the Cabinet decided instead to concentrate on the Committee of Imperial Defence as an effective instrument for continuous study of defence co-ordination. It must be remembered that the coming of peace had reduced the urgency of preparations for war, and owing, perhaps, to this the Prime Minister, from 1920 to 1924, did not act as chairman. In the case of Mr. Lloyd George this was natural enough, for Lord Balfour was willing and available; Mr. Bonar Law was glad to depute Lord Salisbury, Mr. Baldwin in his first ministry fell back on Lord Curzon, while Lord Haldane acted for Mr. MacDonald. In 1924 (a) a sub-committee under Lord Salisbury reported on the whole question and advocated inter alia the creation of a Chiefs of Staff Committee, and the appointment of a minister to preside over the Committee of Imperial Defence as deputy for the Prime Minister. This part of the scheme was not acted upon, for Mr. Baldwin definitely decided that he should preside. His arguments (b) in favour of his decision are important and satisfactory; they are reminiscent of those which caused Mr. Asquith in 1916 to refuse to be removed from the War Committee. The Prime Minister should take part in arriving at decisions, which are certain to be of high importance, and which the Cabinet ought normally to homologate without meticulous criticism; he ought to be au fait with all important developments of defence problems; and he cannot well decide the thorny questions which arise as to the sums to be allocated to the several claimants in the estimates, unless he is cognisant of defence questions. Undoubtedly, it is easier and more effective for him to study these matters at first hand in the committee, instead of merely listening to reports, even from a deputy.

The position thus asserted by Mr. Baldwin, and maintained by subsequent Prime Ministers, naturally did not go uncriticised, and in 1936 the repeated demands for the appointment of a Minister of Defence drove the Government to take action, though it rejected that suggestion absolutely. The grounds for its rejection are in fact strong. The Minister of Defence would have to hold the scales even between three subordinate ministers, a task very difficult for any single man. It would further be difficult to find any person whose talents would seem to others sufficient to justify the subordination to him of other able ministers, and the subordinate posts would not attract men of the highest capacity. There would be risk of friction and intrigue, and the function of co-ordination, it was argued, could be carried out in a more satisfactory manner by the creation, not of a Minister of Defence, but of a Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence; for that office the Attorney-General, Sir T. Inskip, was held out as having the necessary characteristics for a post where patience and skill in securing that men should work effectively and harmoniously together were the prime desiderata (c). To him the Prime Minister delegates (1) the general supervision and control of the whole organisation and activity of the Committee of Imperial Defence; the co-ordination of executive action and of monthly progress reports to the Cabinet, or any committee appointed by it, on the execution of the reconditioning plans; discernment of any points which have not been taken up, or are being pursued too slowly, and of appropriate measures for their rectification. In the Prime Minister's absence he acts as Chairman of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and of the Defence Policy and Requirements Committee of the Cabinet. He has the duty of personal consultation with the Chiefs of Staff, and, while he does not normally preside over their meetings, he may at his discretion convene the Chiefs of Staff Committee. In practice, more important is his function as chairman of the Principal Supply Officers Committee, whose functions obviously are much more of the type that a lawyer is well qualified to deal with than those of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, who doubtless feel more able to discuss all issues freely when they are by themselves. In various ways the new departure is clearly preferable to the scheme of a permanent chairman of the committee other than the Prime Minister.

The personnel of the committee remains as under the original scheme of 1904 (d), the Prime Minister and such other members as he may summon in view of the nature of the matters to be discussed. The essential figures are obviously, beside the Prime Minister and the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs, Home Affairs—air defence being essentially under his control, Dominion Affairs, the Colonies, War, Air, India and Burma, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the three chiefs of staff, and the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, as the head of the Civil Service. Other ministers may be added, as was Mr. R. MacDonald during his membership of the Cabinet as Lord President, after his retirement from the office of Prime Minister (e). Members of the opposition may be invited to attend, as was Mr. Balfour in 1908 (f) and 1914 (g), and again the Labour Government in 1930—31 acted similarly (h). No doubt in the recent crises of 1936—38 the Governments have followed the tradition. Dominion representatives are invited to be present, if any business of interest to them happens to be under discussion, and at times the invitation is accepted, but Canada and the Union do not regularly attend meetings, no doubt on account of the principles that they do not desire to be too closely connected with British defence plans, lest in time of war they should be deemed to be under pledge to co-operate.

(c) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5107, p. 14; see discussions in Commons, February 14th and 27th, 1936.

(d) Treasury Minute, May 4th, 1904; 191 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1527.

(The habit of working through committees, which again appoint smaller sub-committees, has extended greatly since the period of the war, and by this means a very large number of ministers, officials, members of the services, and experts of various kinds are brought ~~to~~ contribute to the satisfactory excoitation of defence measures. Not much importance attaches to the statistics proudly given by ministers to show how active the committee is, but it is clear that it meets often and has carried out a very creditable amount of well-directed activity.)

The Chiefs of Staff Committee serves as an Imperial General Staff; it is charged under the decision of 1924 with the consideration and investigation, whether by reference or on its own initiative, of the problems of imperial defence as a whole, and of the co-ordination of the three services. The

(e) Lord Esher was made a permanent member by Mr. Balfour: Journals, ii. 122, quite anomalously.

(f) Esher, Journals, ii. 316 f., on his invasion memorandum.

(g) Dugdale, ii. 125: this time he was made a regular member.

(h) 299 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 998.

Prime Minister may preside, but this is not regularly done; the chiefs of staff report their collective opinion to him, or to his deputy, whose special function it is to supplement their activities and initiative by guidance and initiative of his own, in order to ensure that every aspect is fully considered, and that difficulties and differences are frankly faced. It is plain that such functions are far from easy to carry out. The views of the three services are inevitably far from accordant, and the effort to compel the chiefs to merge their individual predilections in a single policy must more than task the resources of any minister. But he can, under the authority given to him, at least bring home to the Prime Minister and the Committee of Imperial Defence any serious defect in co-operation.

The Chiefs of Staff Committee (i) presents annually a report to the Committee of Imperial Defence, wherein defence is related to foreign affairs in their constant flux, and proposals made. The report is examined by the committee and sent on with its findings to the Cabinet, where, of course, the ministers, who serve on the committee can naturally count on ready acceptance of everything on which they are in principle agreed. The policy is thus decided, and this is done in time for the estimates, the total of which as regards defence thus rests on the consideration given to this side of the problem by the Committee of Imperial Defence (k). Plainly this modus operandi diminishes the risk of the repetition of the former unedifying struggles between the departments of defence and the Treasury for funds. Naturally, the procedure makes it hard to resist generous allowances for each department, for the chiefs of staff, being human, are no doubt apt to adopt the convenient, if to the public rather expensive, policy of readiness to support each the estimates of the others on the basis of strict reciprocity in treatment.

(i) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5107, p. 15.

(k) Cf. the discussions in the Commons, March 21st, 1934, 287 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1231 ff.

The committee has sub-committees, which vary from time to time in number and in importance. The urgent needs of re-armament attach special importance to the Principal Supply Officers' Committee, for the most pressing requirement has been the securing of materials, men, and factories for the expansion of the Air Force to rival that of Germany; it is significant that the Prime Minister in his anxious speech on March 14th, 1938, following upon the annexation of Austria—due in part, no doubt, to his surrender to the demand of Italy for negotiations—stressed the probability of having to ask for sacrifice, both from employers and employed in that industry. The Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence was made chairman of this body, and it is this field that most of his energies in 1936—38 seems to have been expended. Stress also has been laid on the services of the Joint Planning Committee, which originally consisted of the Directors of Plans of the three departments, but which was strengthened in 1936 by adding three officers, one from each service, graduates of the Imperial Defence College, which was created in 1925 (l). As members of their departments they collect information for the use of the committee which they assist. Its plans then go to the Committee of Imperial Defence. The Overseas Defence Committee still continues to deal with colonial defence, including that of the mandated territories. Home defence, man power, and other topics are likewise entrusted to such bodies, but these points are of no constitutional importance.

But there was created in July, 1935 (m), under Mr. Baldwin's regime, another Cabinet Committee on Defence Policy and Requirements, charged with the general problem of keeping under review the defensive situation, so as to ensure the co-ordination of foreign policy and defence arrangements, and to (l) It secures the training of defence and civil experts in all aspects of preparation for war, and is open to Dominion officers: Canada, Australia and New Zealand use it freely. Its services are of very high value, and the intellectual calibre of those trained and the staff distinguished.

(m) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5107, p. 14.

advise the Cabinet and the Committee of Imperial Defence as to any necessary changes in policy or in the defence proposals requisite in the light of the international and financial situation. This committee was constituted of the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, the heads of the service departments, and other ministers, and its advice resulted in the decision of the Cabinet to strengthen the British forces in the Mediterranean against any sudden attack by Italy. It further advised the extension of the forces, and it served the important purpose of furnishing a reasoned basis for the Government's plans of re-armament, which could thus be presented effectively to Parliament, inaugurating the great effort to make good the gaps in British defence left by the negligence of the previous ministry. The Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence was made naturally in 1936 deputy-chairman of this body, as of the Committee of Imperial Defence. Broadly speaking the differentiation between the two committees is intelligible, the latter concentrating on wider aspects of policy, as contrasted with strategy and co-ordination, but it remains far from obvious that the Committee of Imperial Defence could not have dealt with the issue (n).

6. Other Cabinet Committees.

It is natural that from the earliest period of its existence the Cabinet should have been ready to refer to committees of its own number, special issues for discussion and report, just as in earlier times issues were referred to committees of the Privy Council, and approved at meetings of that body under the Sovereign. One interesting committee was that which drafted the Reform Bill of 1832, and, as under the Privy Council procedure, it was not deemed essential that all members of the committee should be members of the Cabinet. The Crimean War saw the use of committees, one of which was set up to deal with coast defences, for danger from France was long an obsession (o) with British ministries. But most of these committees have had but a temporary existence, being created for definite purposes, such as the Financial Committee (p), which on the tardy re-appearance of the normal Cabinet system in October, 1919, was appointed to aid the Chancellor of the Exchequer; the position was wholly exceptional, for the enormous defence forces and the civil service alike required to be reduced to reasonable dimensions, and the budget had to be placed on a new footing.

(n) On Sir M. Hankey's retirement in 1938, the various offices he had held—Secretary to the Cabinet, Secretary to the Imperial Defence Committee and Clerk of the Council—were separated, but were consolidated under the Secretary to the Cabinet as head of the permanent staff under the Prime Minister; and the Economic Advisory Council was also brought into connection with the staff.

The Home Affairs Committee had a different origin (q). It arose as a palliative of the disorganisation of the War Cabinet period, when that body had no time to deal properly with those issues affecting home administration, which in the pre-war period would, as a matter of course, have been dealt with by the Cabinet, and dates from June, 1918. Its modern form has restricted functions. It considers (r) at the beginning of the session, with the aid of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, who is the Chief Whip, and therefore can speak of conditions in the House of Commons, which of the Bills the Government desires to promote can be dealt with in the time available, having regard to the projects announced in the King's speech, and the claims of the departments for legislation. Secondly, it considers Bills in their technical aspect, with the aid of the Parliamentary counsel to the Treasury; points of drafting, of delegation of legislative power, of mode of enforcement, and so on, as distinguished from matters of principle fall within its sphere. In both of its activities the committee may be assisted by such officials as it thinks fit, and this point is important when Bills affect more than one department, for the matters at issue between departments can thus be dealt with, and so far as possible adjusted, without causing trouble to the Cabinet as a whole. The law officers lend their services, and thus something is done to reduce difficulties as to drafting, and to minimise the possibility of discussions on these heads in Parliament, though to judge from the proceedings in committee of the Commons on Bills the care taken seems insufficient. It is difficult to see how Parliament was asked to pass a Regency Bill (s), under which the power to certify the conditions on which a regency would arise, was given to an even number of persons, including the normal regent, who would thus be placed in a most embarrassing position.

(o) Cf. Palmerston's War Committee, 1859; Bell, ii. 239.

(p) 120 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 744 f. (q) 155 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 122.

(r) The Lord Chancellor usually presides.

Committees are flexible in composition, containing necessarily the ministers whose business is chiefly concerned, including, therefore, in many cases the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose business it will be to find the funds; ministers who have scant or no duties of an administrative kind can serve, and if of judicial habit of mind can aid in adjusting the contending views of departments, but they cannot take the place of the departmental heads, for they alone are in immediate touch with their staffs, and sufficiently cognisant of the issues to be dealt with. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury, however, has here the opportunity to deputise for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and this is one of the reasons why this minister ranks so high in the hierarchy below the Cabinet, and stands forth as normally to be promoted to a vacancy in the Cabinet. If the committee reaches a compromise conclusion, still more if there is a broad measure of agreement, acceptance of its recommendation by the Cabinet is assured, or at least probable. The time of ministers spent on committees, substantial as it is, is partly compensated for by the fact that the system enables the Cabinet to confine its meetings within reasonable dimensions, for much time there is saved by the assumption that the questions dealt with have been fully envisaged, and that a minister should not wantonly re-open the matters debated.

(s) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 15—21; on the Coronation Oath irregularities sanctioned by the Cabinet, pp. 21—31.

The Secretary to the Cabinet, or his deputy (t), acts as secretary with, if convenient, a joint secretary taken from the department chiefly concerned, and minutes, fuller in character than those of the Cabinet, are kept.

One important aspect of Governmental action is not dealt with by a committee of the Cabinet. Economic planning was in 1925 facilitated by the establishment by Mr. Baldwin of a Committee of Civil Research (u), which his successor in 1930 transformed into the Economic Advisory Council (x). It has the Prime Minister as chairman, and includes necessarily the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Board of Trade, the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, and such other ministers as may be invited, together with distinguished experts. It is under the general control of the Prime Minister, and is placed on the Treasury vote. Its function is to study all aspects of economic affairs, whether local, Commonwealth, or international in their bearing on the welfare of the country, to consider developments, and to advise as to possible uses of the national resources. Subject, of course, to the permission of the Prime Minister, it may hold enquiries with a view to reporting and advising as to possible legislation. Contact with Governmental departments and the outside world is maintained, and two standing committees deal with economic information and scientific research. Other committees are set up for special purposes, such as the consideration of the cotton industry (y). But its functions are essentially advisory, and it has made no attempt to formulate a comprehensive (t) The staff consists of a deputy and a principal seconded from the Treasury. (u) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 2440 (May 28th, 1925).

(x) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 3478 (January, 27th, 1930). Cf. Finer, Modern Govt, ii. 901—904.

(y) The Committee on Locust Control issued two reports in 1937.

policy for the approval of the Cabinet and Parliament as a planning scheme for British development.

7. The Secrecy of Cabinet Proceedings.

It is inherent in the position of Cabinet ministers that they should maintain the confidential character of their proceedings. They are charged with the duty of confidential advice to the Crown on the conduct of affairs of the most vital public importance, and they have collective responsibility. The conduct of Government is already difficult enough when on dubious issues the electorate is asked to accept decisions which seem unsatisfactory, and to place trust in the conduct of the Air Ministry, after a competent committee has criticised, with evident justice, the civil side of its work. But it would be impossible for any ministry to carry on, if it were known that there were divisions of opinion in the Government, and that a decision was merely that of a small majority. No doubt hints of division do leak out, but that is a very different thing from open admissions. As Lord Melbourne is alleged to have said of the conclusion of his ministry on the issue of the corn laws: "What are we to say? Is it to make our corn dearer, or cheaper, or to make the price steady? I don't care which: but we had better all be in the same story" (z).

A difficulty obviously arises when a minister feels bound to resign on the score that he cannot continue to accept responsibility for the policy which the Government has determined to adopt. It would be absurd to refuse permission, for a man's honour is involved in such a case, and it was already regarded by Lord Melbourne as settled in principle that the permission must be obtained from the King through the Prime Minister. For the King to act direct would be subversive of the constitutional principles of government (a).

(z) Walpole, Russell, i. 369. Cf. Letters, 2 s., i. 563 (Gladstone's anecdote).

(a) Melbourne Papers, pp. 215 f. (1834).

Lord Derby in 1878 duly received permission, at the time of resignation, but unquestionably the Queen (b) was right in asserting with, of course, the full accord of her Prime Minister, who no doubt inspired her attitude, that the right to explain applies merely to the occasion, and gives no licence to make further disclosures (c). The conclusion to be drawn is that at the time the minister should justify himself as fully as possible. It is natural that the extent of the revelation should be viewed very differently from opposing angles. Mr. Gladstone held that Mr. Chamberlain had exceeded permissible limits in his explanation of his resignation in 1886, and that he must ask for further authority from the Crown. The Queen, who was delighted at Mr. Chamberlain's action, held that the authority given amply covered the statements actually made (d). Lord Salisbury (e) in the same year refused permission to Lord R. Churchill to publish his letter of resignation, rather a futile gesture.

As a rule, a minister who retires gives a fairly full exculpation of his conduct, but his attitude is necessarily affected by his feeling as to future co-operation with his party, and the more serious question of the degree of injury to the public interest which indiscreet disclosures may involve. Mr. Montagu's explanation of his departure from office in March, 1922, was no doubt less effective than he could easily have made it, but he was influenced by the desire not to agitate public feeling in India against the Government by making patent the disregard for Indian views which characterised Lord Curzon all his life, and was exemplified most clearly in his partition of Bengal. It is impossible to read Mr. Eden's apologia on February 21st, 1938, without recognising that he deliberately withheld what must have established beyond doubt his belief that in determining to negotiate with Italy Mr. N. Chamberlain was

(b) Letters, 2 s., ii. 631 f., 634.

(c) In 1888, the Queen objected to Mr. Gladstone revealing a memo. of 1882 on release of Irish prisoners, and he dropped the idea: Guedalla, ii. 427 ff.

(d) Letters, 2 s., iii. 96.

(e) Churchill, ii. 236 f.

yielding to an ultimatum from Signor Mussolini; he deliberately declined in the public interest to press for the papers, which would have proved his case, on the ground that he was anxious not to prejudice any possibility of success in the negotiations so unwisely undertaken, the immediate fruit of which was the annexation of Austria by Herr Hitler, who recognised that the will to resistance of the British Prime Minister had broken, and that he must submit, when warned that he must not attempt to intervene.

The secrecy of Cabinet proceedings was deliberately violated since the war of 1914—19 in the interests of propaganda. In view of the controversy over war guilt most countries published, with more or less accuracy, the records of Governmental proceedings in the critical years before hostilities, and thus we have had copious revelations of such proceedings, including assertions as to what happened in Cabinet. What is not unnatural is that the liberty then assumed for a definite important end has been rather too widely interpreted. Mr. Churchill and Mr. Lloyd George alike, in their discussions, have used material in the shape of Cabinet memoranda, and their action has been criticised. Exception might be taken, either on the score that such use is a violation of the Privy Councillor's oath of secrecy, or on the more effective ground that such publication is a breach of the Official Secrets Acts, 1911 and 1920. In the case of Mr. Edgar Lansbury in 1934, his temerity in publishing nothing more noxious than a memorandum drawn up by his father for submission to the Labour Cabinet of 1929—31, resulted in a prosecution and a fine, which certainly raised the question of differential treatment. Moreover, there is a certain difficulty in regarding as worthy of punishment the publication of the ipsissima verba of what a Cabinet minister recommended to a former Cabinet. He could not be prevented from stating what his views of policy at the time were, and adding that, of course, he made them known to his colleagues. The law, it may be feared, is not always administered with discretion. His father, it may be added, proved at the same time recalcitrant as regards his right to retain copies of Cabinet minutes and memoranda, when the Cabinet decided that the old practice should cease, by which this was done, when ministers ceased to hold office. The present restrictions are palpably hard to observe, and in 1931, when the Labour Government resigned, the actors in the drama made statements of remarkably contradictory character, which a full examination of the Cabinet records would presumably have cleared up decisively. Mr. Lloyd George, with some justification, contended that, if a minister in or out of office published an account of a transaction, which was one-sided, it should be permissible to give the whole of the facts, declaring that the existing position which made publication in effect depend on the will of the Prime Minister of the day was unfair, as the latter must be affected in his attitude by considerations of party advantage, but very naturally in the circumstances the Prime Minister (f) preferred to retain a check on what might otherwise have been very embarrassing revelations. That the information will indefinitely be suppressed is not probable; after a lapse of time publication in the memoirs of eminent statesmen will prove safe, though possibly if the new rule prevails that documents may not be taken away, there will be less material available. But no doubt a minister has always his own copy of a Cabinet memorandum (g) prepared by himself, and nothing can prevent one who wishes his memory to be vindicated later on from having Cabinet documents copied in secrecy. It must be added, however, that at present the rule of secrecy is carried so far that the records of the proceedings of one Cabinet are held not to be open to the scrutiny of another (h), though frankly this rule can have no sanction, save the loyalty to it of the Prime Minister, and he would be bound to depart from it if sufficient cause in the public interest were made out. Naturally this prohibition must be confined to the motives for decisions, so far as revealed in the minutes, as opposed to the actual decisions taken, which must be regarded as an essential part of the res gestæ, and therefore must be known to a succeeding ministry.

(f) 238 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 2205 ff.

(g) See, e.g., for such cases, Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, i. 265 ff., 353 f., 357 f.

(h) 261 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1163 f. (reply to Mr. Lansbury.)

The rules of secrecy apply to Cabinet deliberations and to proceedings of Cabinet ministers. In pre-war days the rule precluded the presence of any non-Cabinet minister; disapproval was voiced by purists when Lord Cawdor, appointed First Lord of the Admiralty, was summoned and attended as a Cabinet minister before he had been sworn of the Privy Council. Lord Lansdowne's defence of his action, as analogous to the attendance of a law officer, was clearly insufficient, for he was not summoned as such (i). In 1907, on the other hand, Mr. McKenna, when appointed President of the Board of Education, did not receive a summons as a Cabinet minister until duly sworn, though at one meeting he attended for a short time to answer questions on a matter affecting his department. It is clear, that in the latter proceeding, there was nothing irregular, though the practice had become rare in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries before the war, when, as Mr. Asquith records, "no stranger (unless specially summoned to give information on a particular matter) was ever admitted, and when a message came from outside the door was always opened and shut by a minister," a rule illustrated by the treatment of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies during the absence of Mr. J. Chamberlain in South Africa. During the period of the War Cabinet a vast number of outsiders were called to its meetings, 248 in its first year alone. For the most part (k) these were ministers and departmental heads from the defence and the civil departments, with outside experts at the discretion of ministers, and the procedure was manifestly necessary to keep the War Cabinet in touch with the rest of the administration, which otherwise would have been dangerously divorced from contact with it. Since the war, no doubt, this process is rarely necessary, but the presence of the Cabinet Secretary is an abiding token of the changed conditions under which the Cabinet operates as compared with pre-war action. The ban on smoking, which used to preserve the atmosphere of the Cabinet room from undue modernity, has also disappeared.

(i) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 123.

(k) One notable visitor was Col. House in 1917.

The War Cabinet won evil notoriety for leakage of secrets of its grave divisions in April and May, 1916, on the issue of conscription, which only terminated on the acceptance of that policy. An Order in Council was issued with parliamentary approval, prohibiting publication of Cabinet secrets, but its efficacy was not tried (l).

8. The War Cabinet and the Project of Cabinet Reform.

The deeds of the War Cabinet are principally of interest now, because it presented an attempt to devise an effective means of carrying on war by a democratic country on the principle of civilian control in the ultimate issue of the operations of the defence forces of the Crown. It was unfortunate in its inception. Instead of developing naturally, its advent was brought about in circumstances which have gravely affected ever since the working of the party system and the relations of leading politicians.

As already mentioned, after October, 1914, the Committee of Imperial Defence suffered transmutation into a War Council, composed of the Prime Minister, the Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs, War, and India, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Balfour, whose connection with the Committee of Imperial Defence has been noted above, and experts. Lord Haldane and Sir Arthur Wilson were added in 1915 (m). The essential differences between the new body and the Committee was that it had a measure of executive authority, though it is not the case that only under it were formal notes of decisions circulated to the departments. But the Cabinet retained control of all essential matters, the choice of the objectives to be secured by the forces, the raising of men, the production of munitions, and finance. Military details it left alone, except for special cause, as in the original decision not to send troops to hold the line to Antwerp, a decision hastily modified in anticipation of Cabinet assent by the ministers immediately concerned. Munitions early caused difficulty, for the prodigal use in modern warfare had never been provided for, and a Munitions Committee was set up in October to be replaced by another in April, 1915, but the problem remained unsolved, and Mr. Lloyd George tackled it as Minister of Munitions. It is not clear that the Cabinet system in the interim was functioning badly; the Dardanelles attack was duly considered and recommended by the War Council, which was certainly competent enough in structure and personnel, and blame for it must fall in large measure on the heads of the defence departments. The Cabinet struggled, not without success, with the issues of neutral rights, involving relations of extreme delicacy with the United States, with the effort to bribe Italy sufficiently to desert her allies, and with the possibility of mobilising support in the Balkan States (n). The reproach of Mr. Lloyd George that the War Council did not meet from April 6th to May 14th is meaningless, unless it can be shown that any work necessary was being neglected (o), in fact the Cabinet was approving all necessary action. But it was natural that the opposition should resent the shortage of shells, especially as Sir J. French secretly inspired them to overthrow the ministry he was serving, and the failure of the Dardanelles, and the resignation of Lord Fisher, at this period clearly the worst adviser the Admiralty could have had in view of his devotion to an absurd plan to land troops in Germany, and his failure to make clear his objections to the Dardanelles operations, compelled the formation of a coalition Government (p).

(l) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 209—211.

(m) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 126 ff.

(n) The promise of Constantinople to Russia was agreed on in consultation with the opposition: Spender, ii. 129; Grey, Twenty-five Years, ii. 181.

(o) Spender, ii. 160 ff.

The result of coalition was probably gravely injurious to the purpose it was intended to serve, the effective carrying out of the war. The War Council became in June the Dardanelles Committee, which was overmanned with the Prime Minister, Lord Kitchener, Lord Crewe, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Churchill for the Liberals, Mr. Balfour at the Admiralty—where he was fated to inflict on the navy the stigma of having apparently lost the Battle of Jutland, with results painfully injurious to British prestige—Mr. Bonar Law, Sir E. Carson, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Curzon and Lord Selborne for the Conservatives. Such a galaxy of talent failed to produce efficiency in decisions, and, so far was their collective judgment from impressing the Cabinet as a whole, that questions were raised again in the whole body. Whatever chance there remained of success at the Dardanelles was smothered in the talk and delays of this unfortunate body, which in November, 1915, was renamed more suitably the War Committee. There is no doubt that it was too large, and it seems that it was not loyally served by the departments, which are accused of having withheld essential information of technical character, and of having delayed and obstructed the execution of its decisions (q). It seems also that it was overburdened with duties, which minor bodies could well have disposed of. Mr. Lloyd George felt himself hampered, and in communication with Mr. Bonar Law decided to press for the creation of a War Committee with full executive powers, from which the Prime Minister would be excluded, while having the right to refer to the Cabinet any matter he thought necessary. The Prime Minister rejected this suggestion, and after rather unsatisfactory intrigues resigned, to be succeeded by Mr. Lloyd George. His solution took the shape of a War Cabinet (r), whose members should be freed from departmental duties, and who could thus employ their intellects in considering the momentous questions involved in the prosecution of war. The Cabinet remained accessible to ministers and their experts, but it claimed the right of dealing direct with the latter, and directed they were to speak freely without regard to the opinions of their political chiefs. The secretariat of the War Council was duly taken over, and the Foreign Secretary, the First Sea Lord and the Chief of the Imperial General Staff attended regularly to give information. The Cabinet deliberated on policy, but necessarily much of its time was devoted to dealing with proposals of ministers and with inter-departmental discussions. It referred minor issues to its members, or to committees of ministers, either with powers to decide or merely to report. There were, in fact, almost endless committees on war priorities, which blossomed forth into sub-committees of labour, works construction, and industries inter alia; on eastern affairs, on economic defence and development, and home affairs, regarded as necessary to mitigate the chaos produced by the absence of the ordinary Cabinet. The Demobilisation Committee distinguished itself by devising a scheme under which men of short service would have been released at the request of their employers at the expense of soldiers who had borne the brunt of the war; it resulted in clear indications of mutiny among troops called upon to leave London for return to duty, and Mr. Churchill had hastily to scrap a scheme which would, if persisted in, have led to utter disaster.

(p) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 272 ff.

(q) Spender, ii. 253.

One purpose, however, was usefully served by the decision to invite the Dominion Prime Ministers to take part when in England for the Imperial War Conferences of 1917 and 1918, in meetings of the War Cabinet. These meetings served to give the Dominions the feeling that in determining the great issues of the war, they were not being ignored. The Dominion Governments had placed their forces at the disposal of the British Government, so far as their navies and their oversea contingent were concerned, and except by the device of the War Cabinet they might have resented their position of being without control of the mode in which their units were employed. The Cabinet thus enlarged was, of course, wholly anomalous. It was as Sir R. Borden, Premier of Canada, declared, a Cabinet of Governments in which there was no Prime Minister in the true sense, for all the Prime Ministers were equal in status, each owing allegiance to his own Parliament. All decisions were thus subject to approval, and if approved to execution by each Government, but the situation was simplified by the fact that the British War Cabinet members, being in full control of the Dominions forces, could act at once on any decision agreed to as to the conduct of the war, for the Dominions, in handing over control of their forces, necessarily left to the British Government the decision how they were to be used. It was not necessary, therefore, that decisions on these heads should be dealt with in Dominion Parliaments. In all other matters, as for instance, the economic regime to be applied to enemy and allied countries after the war, the Dominion ministers could only assent ad referendum (s). When the armistice resulted, in 1919, in the transformation of the Imperial War Cabinet into the British Empire Delegation to the Peace Conference at Paris, the distinct position of the Dominions was also claimed and conceded, as they were naturally unwilling to appear in a position inferior to that of the minor powers, which had made no comparable contribution to the achievement of victory, and thus the Dominions were allowed delegations of their own, beside the Empire delegation, in whose deliberations they took part.

(r) War Memoirs, ii. 982 ff.; Parl. Pap. Cd. 9005; Cmd. 325 (reports for 1917 and 1918).

It was agreed that, while the Dominion Prime Ministers were not in England, they could be represented by representatives chosen by them, for discussions similar to those of the Imperial War Cabinet, but little came of this suggestion, which would have been difficult to carry out. But General Smuts was invited in 1917 to become a member of the British War Cabinet, as an individual specially qualified. His position was anomalous, and some exception was taken to it, as he was not a peer or a member of the Commons, but the proposal was duly carried out without any unsatisfactory results.

(s) Keith, War Government of the British Dominions, pp. 29 ff.

Of the work of the War Cabinet not much can be said without controversy. Its merits were strongly supported by Mr. Lloyd George, but it is dubious if his eulogies are at all deserved. The measure of success achieved in the war was not conspicuous, and the impression derived, whether from Mr. Duff Cooper's Haig or Sir W. Robertson's Soldiers and Statesmen, or the Diaries of Sir H. Wilson, is one of lack of clear vision and decision on the part of the Cabinet as regards war policy, while it is hardly doubtful that there was grave waste of public funds and misdirection of policy as regards man power and munitions alike. It is clear also that the delay in reverting to normality was needless and undesirable, and that the effort to induce Mr. A. Chamberlain to serve as Chancellor of the Exchequer without a seat in the Cabinet, was discreditable both to Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Bonar Law, showing both to be singularly lacking in appreciation of the essential principles of public economy (t).

The lessons to be deduced from the experiment are not of great novelty. Palpably in war time the Cabinet system has to be modified in some degree so as to secure the existence of a body, which is in a position to take swift decisions without fear of their being disturbed. The obvious mode of such action is the creation of a Cabinet Committee empowered to act, on which the Prime Minister would sit. Such a solution of the problem would probably have proved more satisfactory in the war than that actually tried, which was too much dominated by a man whose eagerness to win the war was not equalled by his ability to plan consecutively and consistently, and whose colleagues showed no remarkable skill or capacity; it is significant that no one of them left any impression on the country by reason of his service thereon. But it is also clear that the business of the country requires a Cabinet in which sit the heads of the great departments, so that they share in responsibility for all decisions. Under the War Cabinet system the responsibility appertained to the War Cabinet alone (u), and thus the heads of the departments were at liberty to advocate their views without regard to counter-claims by other departments, for they had for them no jot of responsibility, and they were impelled by every consideration of departmental interest to press without stint the views of their own interests, since otherwise they might find them neglected through the superior insistence of another head.

(t) Chamberlain, Down the Years, pp. 139 ff.

No conclusion can be drawn from the War Cabinet in support of the suggestion of the Machinery of Government Committee (x) in favour of reducing the number of Cabinet ministers and of enabling a small body to consider problems and to plan for the nation without being overburdened with departmental duties. It is one objection, and by no means unimportant, that the workings of the Parliamentary system are very inimical to the presence in the Commons at least of men of the requisite character and ability to plan for national development. The qualities which produce such characters are not such as are likely to lead to desire for, or success in, efforts to reach membership of the Commons or office. It is a further difficulty that the nature of politicians is not such as to encourage the belief that men would be found to be willing to act as non-Cabinet ministers in such a régime as is contemplated. Men are seldom willing to admit the superiority of others in the degree requisite to work any such plan. It must be remembered also that, in order to deal with the practical problems of government, experience of administration is extremely desirable. It is important in the highest degree that the men in the Cabinet should have served an apprenticeship of considerable duration, and even more so in all probability that they should still be in direct touch with the activities and problems of a great department. A Cabinet may well be aided by ministers who are not burdened by administrative duties, but they will be most valuable if they have had experience of such and are still in touch with the issues which come before the Cabinet.

(u) Beaverbrook, Politicians and the War, ii. 323.

(x) Temporary ministries existed for National Service, Munitions, Food and Shipping, and Mr. Fisher undertook control of education. Lloyd George in his War Memoirs provides high praise for his protégés.

One experiment was made under the War Cabinet system, that of giving ministries to men not professional politicians (x). It may fairly be said that its success often was dubious, and in the best cases not distinguished. Government is a business with rules of its own, and it is best conducted by men who have made it their lifework to familiarise themselves with these rules. The advent of normal government saw the hasty retreat to their normal sphere of the neophytes, without leaving any personal contribution of lasting value to the welfare of their people, though recognition is due to their eager labour and desire to help their country.

Neither the War Cabinet nor its predecessor arrived at any effective solution of the problem of the true relation between the civil control of actions in war and the position of the heads of the services. The war brought with it a special difficulty in the fact that Lord Kitchener, as Secretary of State, dominated his department, and the Imperial General Staff virtually disappeared (y). After the formation of the coalition in 1915, during which the supersession of Lord Kitchener was actually considered (z), it was increasingly difficult for ministers to work with him, and in September, 1915, the decision was taken by the Cabinet to reconstitute the Staff and to appoint to its head, Sir William Robertson.

(y) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 127 f.

(z) Churchill, War Crisis, 1915, pp. 273—275, 374.

Sir W. Robertson was anxious to effect two ends (a), to secure that the War Council or Committee should be so constituted as to be able to take rapid decisions without reference to other authorities; and to provide that the execution of policy should be entrusted to the Chief of the General Staff, who was on this head to become the channel of advice for the War Committee. Technically, he secured that without interference with the constitutional position of the Secretary of State or the Cabinet, all orders for military operations should be issued and signed by the Chief of the Imperial General Staff “under the authority of the Secretary of State for War, and not under that of the Army Council.” This precluded the possibility of the War Committee, acting through the Secretary of State and the Army Council, a body of mixed composition and of administrative functions, issuing orders which had not been submitted to the expert criticism of the General Staff, and at the same time Sir W. Robertson was accorded direct access to the War Committee, which thus could receive a purely military view. This arrangement worked well in 1916 (b), and Mr. Asquith strongly upheld the doctrine that, while the Cabinet must decide on objectives, they should homologate without debate all decisions on current operations recommended by the General Staff working in conjunction with the generals at the front.

Mr. Lloyd George, on the other hand, had very strong views on the proper method of conducting the war. Hence the decision of the War Cabinet (c), in February, 1917, to place the British army under the command of the French Commander-in-Chief. It was arrived at in the absence, deliberately arranged, of Sir W. Robertson, and was successfully whittled down by Sir D. Haig. But the interpretation placed on the agreement at Calais by Gen. Nivelle met determined resistance on the part of Sir D. Haig, and at

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 189 f.

(b) Maurice, Governments and War, p. 139.

(c) Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 46 ff.

London, on March 14th, his position was more effectively explained, and any idea of subordination to Gen. Nivelle removed (d). Later in the year the two had to fight against the Premier's desire for a campaign based on Italy (e). In October the policy of Sir D. Haig, supported by Sir W. Robertson, was fiercely attacked by the Premier, who invited the views of Lord French, whom Mr. Asquith had had to supersede, and Sir H. Wilson (f). Sir W. Robertson then desired to resign, but was dissuaded by Sir D. Haig, who remained convinced that no officer should resign unless the Government declared his services no longer required. But these officers, though ready to criticise, could not recommend any attempt to change the essential theatre of war. They supported, however, the Premier in his favourite idea of setting up an inter-allied body for the supreme control of operations. But in November, at Rapallo (g), an agreement was made by the Premier for the creation of a Supreme War Council, at whose meeting, on February 1st, 1918, Sir W. Robertson disagreed with the Premier's proposals as to Turkey. The decision was reached by the Premier that a general reserve should be created, and that orders regarding the use of the British forces included therein could be given by an executive committee of the Council, thus creating an unconstitutional position, and superseding the authority of the Army Council (h). The solution was then suggested of the reduction of the position of the Chief of Staff to what it was before 1915, and the stationing at Versailles of a deputy as military representative and member of the Army Council, with authority to give orders as to the use of the reserve (i). The latter post was offered to Sir W. Robertson, who declined, and also declined to remain as Chief of Staff with diminished status. Sir H. Wilson took his place, but Sir D. Haig made it clear that he accepted no responsibility for the new position, but accepted the constitutional possibility of receiving orders

(d) Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 70 ff.

(e) Haig, ii. 123 ff.

(f) Haig, ii. 180.

(g) Haig, ii. 214.

(h) Haig, ii. 223 f.

(i) Haig, ii. 224 ff.

through a member of the Army Council. Fortunately the placing at Versailles of Sir H. Rawlinson minimised the dangers of the new position, for he realised the position of Sir D. Haig and successfully prevented his having to yield divisions for the reserve. In the event, unity of command was asked for by Sir D. Haig (k), when on March 24th he found that Gen. Pétain was not prepared to keep in effective touch with the much battered British army. His appeal to Lord Milner and Sir H. Wilson to secure the appointment of Marshal Foch was successful, and the Commander-in-Chief began effective resistance, leading up ultimately to victories in whose planning he had a decisive voice (l). But none the less, intrigues by Sir H. Wilson for his removal went on (m), and efforts were made by the Premier to conceal the fact that the portion of the line in France to be held by the British army had been increased by a decision in which Sir D. Haig had not concurred (n), while it was asserted that the army in France was considerably stronger on January 1st, 1918, than on January 1st, 1917. When Sir F. Maurice categorically denied the assertions of ministers on these points, Mr. Bonar Law proposed an enquiry by two judges, but, when on May 9th Mr. Asquith proposed, instead, investigation by a Select Committee, the Premier made a vehement appeal to his followers to support him, ignoring entirely Mr. Law's admission that inquiry was necessary, and naturally carried the day (o).

It is, however, clear that the problem of civilian and soldier was far from solved; Mr. Asquith disclaimed amateur strategy, and found himself not very brilliantly served (p), while Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Churchill, so long as he was in the Cabinet, sought to practise it, certainly in both cases without success. The rather melancholy conclusion suggests itself that it is wiser to avoid war.

(k) Haig, ii. 254 ff.

(l) Haig, ii. 330 ff.

(m) Callwell, Wilson, ii. 99; Haig, ii. 300, 328 f.

(n) Haig, ii. 286, 300 f.

(o) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 299 ff.

(p) Memories, ii. ch. xv.

CHAPTER V.

THE MINISTRY.

1. The Extent and Character of Responsibility for Administration.

BRITISH governmental activity at present covers great areas of human life, and authority is exercised in most varied forms. Historically, this is a creation of a Victorian era, which saw a wide expansion of the functions of the State. At an earlier date governmental activities were reduced to little more than the necessities of defence and preservation of the country from hostile aggression, the maintenance of a measure of internal order, and the furtherance of trade and agriculture. Such local government as existed was carried on largely by close corporate bodies in the borough and by magistrates, holding commissions as justices of the peace in the country, acting in the main under statutory authority and controlled chiefly through the Courts. The advance of democracy has meant a complete change; new subjects, such as education, public health, labour conditions, social welfare, have claimed the attention both of the central and the local authorities, while the latter have been virtually recreated on the basis of responsibility to local electorates, and at the same time the needs of co-ordination and control have been met by placing power of guidance and supervision of their activities under law in the hands of central authorities (a).

The powers which are exercised in central and local government in the newer spheres of activity are derived from statute, not the prerogative, but the older departments of State still exercise large portions of the prerogative, though extended or restricted by statute in many ways. None the less, the prerogative of the Crown in foreign affairs is exercised with Cabinet approval by the Secretary of State with very slight statutory intervention, and much of the work of the Secretary of State for the Colonies must be traced to the same source. The Home Secretary has many statutory functions, but he advises also as to the exercise of various old prerogatives, and all the statutory regulation of the defence forces does not touch such essential questions as the control of their disposition or the making of war or peace.

(a) W. A. Robson, Development of Local Government.

Local authorities act under statutory powers and the control of the central government over them is statutory. Hence the central departments owe responsibility to Parliament not for whatever the local authorities do, but for the mode in which they exercise or fail to exercise the control which they have power to exercise. Responsible government, that is to say, is restricted to cases where it can be truly asserted that the ministry had power to act, and did not. A simple test of responsibility is provided in Parliament by the rule that the Speaker will not allow questions to be asked where there is no responsibility, and if a question passes his scrutiny, the minister can at once dispose of it by this contention, and his answer must be accepted.

In certain cases, with increasing frequency of late years, Parliament has handed over important functions to statutory authorities which are not, like local bodies, subject to periodic approval by a popular electorate, nor controlled by the central Government in the normal exercise of their functions. The motives in such cases vary, but the governing principle is clear, the desire to relieve the ministry of responsibility for matters which are best dealt with without being subjected to intervention based on political considerations. The British Broadcasting Corporation (b) is a chartered body, with a defined constitution, under which certain paramount rights of interference in the interests of the State are conceded, but it is held that the devising of programmes, and the securing that prudent restraint in respect of matter broadcasted, which international and internal conditions justify, are best left to a body carefully chosen for intelligence and impartiality, so that the minister can answer complaints about the cancellation of broadcasts with the reply that the matter is one which Parliament has seen fit to entrust to the Corporation. The establishment of an Unemployment Assistance Board, with power on the part of the Minister of Labour carefully defined, serves the purpose of preventing daily interpellations of the minister in respect of individual cases. In some instances the plan is adopted of providing for control of marketing by producers, as in the case of the numerous Marketing Boards, or the Herring Industry Board; by this means the producers are enabled to apply to the whole mass of producers rules which are supposed to be valuable for the common interest, while the minister is relieved of main responsibility and can parry questions by referring to the autonomy given by the relevant legislation.

(b) See Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5091 (Committee's report), 5329 (charter), 5088, 5207.

Technical issues are often entrusted to bodies semi-autonomous, such as the London Passenger Transport Board, or the Central Electricity Board, which supplies electricity to certain undertakers, and to the railway companies by a national transmission system. But there are difficulties in giving independence, as well as advantages. The attitude of the London Passenger Transport Board on the question of facilitating the employment of its workers in the territorial army proved so obstructive and hostile as to annoy deeply the War Office, and brought about the curious incident in March, 1938, of the adjournment being successfully moved by a private member on the second reading of a Bill promoted by the Board in order that conversations should take place with its members to arrange a compromise, as later happened. In the case of the Unemployment Assistance Board the power to produce regulations is given to it, subject to approval by both Houses of Parliament. The first set produced in 1935 was duly so approved, but in working such difficulties developed as to render members of the Conservative party, as well as of the opposition, acutely uncomfortable. The regulations, however, could not be changed, except on the initiative of the Board. Therefore, advantage had to be taken of a supplementary estimate for the expenses of the Board, and the appeal tribunals under it for a general criticism, and the Minister of Labour represented the views of the House to the chairman, with the result that the Board duly asked Parliament (c) to suspend the operation of the regulations which it had made, so that after further consideration a fresh set could be submitted and duly approved.

In such cases, as in the matters of local government, ministers are responsible to Parliament only in a limited manner, based on the powers accorded. It is normally undesirable to seek to press them to exercise further authority; if the system works badly, then they can be pressed to take extra legislative powers, for this is superior to usurping authority. Moreover, undue interference has the bad result of weakening the responsibility of such bodies, and therefore spoils their work.

In certain cases the responsibility is still more attenuated. The Exchequer and Audit Department is intended to secure the control of Parliament over the expenditure of the public money which it votes, and it is clearly desirable that the Comptroller and Auditor-General should be free from ministerial control. In the Constitution of Eire he is chosen by the Dáil. In the United Kingdom the ministry appoints, but he is secured from dismissal without parliamentary initiative, and the only matters in which he is controlled have reference to the need of Treasury sanction for the numbers and pay of his staff, and the Treasury may lay down regulations for his guidance regarding certain types of account. These restrictions are unimportant; if the Treasury tried to restrict his staff unduly, he would report the fact to the Public Accounts Committee, and Parliament would no doubt intervene. Ministers again are not responsible for the staffs of the Houses of Parliament, which are controlled by a Select Committee of the Lords, and a Statutory Committee, presided over by the Speaker, for the Commons. The Royal Household and the Lord Great Chamberlain's Department, the offices of the Duchy of Cornwall, and the County Palatine of Durham, and the College of Arms, the Irish Heralds' College, and in Scotland, the Court of the Lord Lyon are not subject to ministerial responsibility; indeed, the Lord Lyon has so repeatedly worried the Secretary of State for Scotland, and the people of Scotland, by his efforts to thwart the royal desire not to interfere too much with the decorative display of the Royal Standard of Scotland on ceremonial occasions, that his activities have had to be curbed by a royal warrant in 1934, and the question of abolishing a quite useless office has been raised, but not pressed, doubtless in the hope that the next person appointed may be more cautious in the exercise of his functions. It is a curious instance of Scottish tolerance of abuses which would not be permitted to continue for a moment in England. The Charity Commission is represented in the Commons by a commissioner appointed by the Crown, and so matters regarding it can be dealt with, but the member is not strictly speaking a minister. There is, however, a vote on the estimates, and to this extent Treasury control. The Forestry Commission, which expends considerable sums of public money, is also represented by a commissioner without ministerial rank. The Ecclesiastical and Church Estates Commission is represented by the second commissioner, who is appointed by the Crown, and answers questions in the House in which he sits, but there is no estimate. Queen Anne's Bounty is administered without ministerial responsibility, as is Trinity House.

(c) Unemployment Assistance (Temporary Provisions) Acts, 1935
(cc. 6, 22).

Over the Courts the control of ministers is minimal, even in the case of the Lord Chancellor as regards the Royal Courts of Justice. There are also minor tribunals, which are in a like position, such as the General and Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who in this capacity are not interfered with by the Board of Inland Revenue. There are also the Road and Rail Traffic Appeal Tribunal, the Railway Assessment Authority, the Anglo-Scottish Railway Assessment Authority, the Railway and Canal Commission, the Land Values Reference Committee, the Coal Mines Reference Committee and the Patents Appeal Tribunal. In Scotland the Law Courts enjoy like immunity.

Over many other departments it is not necessary to set political heads, because it suffices to secure due responsibility by subordinating them to a minister in charge of a major department. The Treasury is naturally placed in control of the Boards of Customs and Excise, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the Civil Service Commission, the Mint, the Treasury Solicitor's Office, the Parliamentary Counsel's Office, the National Gallery and the National Portrait Gallery, the British Museum, Wallace Collection, Record Office, the Stationery Office, the London Gazette Office, the Development Commissioners, and the Meteorological Office, which for administrative purposes is under the Ministry for Air. The control of the Treasury extends to the Paymaster-General's Office, and in Scotland to the Office of the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer at Edinburgh. Questions on the proceedings of any of these bodies can therefore be put in Parliament, and will be answered normally by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

2. The Functions of Ministers.

It is the duty of the minister to accept responsibility for the work done by his department, and by any departments subject thereto. Responsibility means that he must satisfy two rather different authorities. He has been placed in charge of the portfolio by the Prime Minister, and therefore he must so conduct himself in office as to give his chief no reason to regret that he made the selection, and that normally involves that he must prove acceptable to the rest of the Cabinet. But he must also secure the favour of the House of Commons, and succeed either in justifying clearly any action on the part of his department which is called in question, or in apologising gracefully for any slip, and conveying the impression that there will be no repetition of the blunder impugned. A minister who seeks to defend the indefensible may be appreciated by his office as loyal to his subordinates, but from the governmental point of view such an attitude is probably a mistake. If he cannot keep the confidence of the Commons, it is clearly desirable that he should resign, and thus save his colleagues from the difficulty of defending him or the unpleasantness of removing him. Theoretically, of course, mere retirement is not the sole penalty available. The right of the Commons to impeach a minister is legally intact (d), however improbable its use may be. Moreover, a minister guilty of misfeasance in office may bring himself under a penal law, as has happened in the Dominions, even of comparatively late years. It was, however, not decided to take any legal proceedings in the case of Mr. J. H. Thomas's revelation of facts about the budget in 1936, and there would always be reluctance to proceed further against a minister who resigned, as in that case, both office and membership of Parliament. If the latter step were not taken, expulsion would, of course, be possible and might easily be resorted to. In Mr. Thomas's case his name was not removed from the Privy Council, which naturally seemed rather curious to the public who could not quite understand how a man should be regarded as unsuitable to remain in the House of Commons, but yet should continue sufficiently honourable to appear in public as a member of that august body (e).

(d) Ridges, Const. Law. (ed. Keith), pp. 215 f.

(e) Sir C. Dilke was not removed in 1886: Letters, 3 s., i. 168; nor C. Rhodes in 1896: Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 123.

The nature of the functions of the minister explain the apparent anomaly that the head of a department is normally far inferior in knowledge of the matters with which it deals, to the chief permanent officials. He serves as the link between the House of Commons and the department, and secures that neither encroaches on the sphere of the other, that the department shall administer and devise new proposals, but always subject to the principles which the Commons has approved or will homologate. His ability to do so is largely derived from the fact that he has served in Parliament, usually in the Commons for a period of years, and that before attaining to the head of the department he has learned something of the conduct of business from service. A young member may secure the post of parliamentary private secretary which is unpaid, but which allows him to become familiar with the mode in which his chief handles public business; he will, if he makes himself useful, have a reasonable chance of promotion to a minor office, one of those now classed as Under-Secretaryships of State. If he shows competence therein, and if his chief is in the Lords, he will have a real chance of doing so, then he may reasonably expect an office, quite possibly of Cabinet rank, though ministers may serve quite long periods, with considerable apparent success, before that position is accorded; Lord Winterton's very long parliamentary career only brought him into the Cabinet as Chancellor of the Duchy in 1938, because of Mr. N. Chamberlain's desire to avoid having to remove Lord Swinton from the Secretaryship of Air, in which office he was held by many Conservatives to have failed to show the requisite driving power to cope with the necessity of rapid re-armament. Sometimes, of course, ministers succeed very early in their careers in obtaining high preferment, but that was more usual in the past in less democratic days; the careers of Lord Hartington and Mr. A. J. Balfour (f) are eloquent instances of the opportunities open to men connected with great families with traditions of public service, and it would be absurd to ignore the advantage of such connections even at the present day.

(f) Cf. Dugdale, i. 88 ff.

The advantages to a minister of an apprenticeship are plain and amply justify Mr. Gladstone's re-affirmation of Sir R. Peel's view that it was undesirable to make a man a Cabinet minister without some such experience. The difficulties of the Labour ministry in 1924 were patently much increased by the lack of men with experience, and the construction of an effective ministry would probably have been impossible without the aid actually accorded by politicians hitherto without Labour leanings in politics. The essential qualification of a minister is that he can form an effective judgment from the papers presented to him and the conversations of the heads of the permanent staff or junior officials specially expert, and can persuade others, in the Cabinet or Parliament, of the soundness of his judgment. That is an art not easily learned; the mass of work in any Government office is enormous, and to grasp essentials is a task which must be acquired if a minister is not to succumb to the temptation merely to follow the lead of his staff without effective criticism. A minister ought not to fail in making a contribution to the views of his department; it is essentially his duty to foresee the reaction of the Commons or Cabinet, and make it clear to his officers how far they must modify their proposals to meet this consideration. He may often admit quite frankly that the departmental view is ideal, but must add that under parliamentary government it is often necessary to aim not at the best, but at such approximation thereto as is most likely to be accepted by Parliament. It is this fact that renders of minor importance the transfer of ministers at fairly rapid intervals from post to post. Variety of experience is not a bad thing for a minister, whose views must be so much moulded by parliamentary considerations. The introduction, however, of much similarity in scales of salary by the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, will remove the desire for change which used to be associated with the illogical differences between salaries, and there is no doubt an advantage in a minister remaining long enough to acquire the necessary technical knowledge to be really helpful to his department (g), and to be able to meet successfully departmental arguments, which at first sight seem unanswerable. To help on Post Office re-organisation in the manner of Sir Kingsley Wood needs a reasonable time, a fact which explains why many Postmasters-General have left singularly little trace that they ever held that office.

The supreme test of ministerial ability is the skill shown in dealing with divergent views of experts, especially in those departments, such as the defence departments, where the difference between an expert and a layman is peculiarly obvious. Here the difficulties are serious. A minister, of course, can often rely on the permanent head of the department; in the Colonial or India or Burma Offices the minister will necessarily feel reluctant to depart from the advice tendered by a man who has been for years cognisant of the issues which arise, especially if in the case of the India and Burma Offices it accords with that of his advisory council. But there is always the temptation that he may be carried away by extraneous influences. It is difficult, for instance, to suppose that the palpable error of introducing Chinese on semi-servile conditions into the Transvaal would have been committed, if the minister had followed the traditional outlook of the Colonial Office (h) in these matters in preference to the promptings of the financial interests concerned, not with the permanent advantage of South Africa, but with immediate opportunities of profit-making for themselves. Mr. Balfour's famous policy (i) of establishing a National Home for the Jews was clearly not based on departmental advice, and it is plain that the unfortunate muddle in policy which was made by the Labour Government in 1930 was due to the fact that a very carefully thought out scheme, doing justice to the Arabs, as well as the Jews, was disturbed and confused by the sentimentalism of the Prime Minister, who was induced to send to Dr. Weizmann a letter which was irreconcilable with the policy deliberately adopted, and has helped to pave the way for the present situation, when British forces are being used to destroy Arabs who are seeking to defend their country from being subjected to Jewish domination in flat contradiction with elementary principles of fair treatment. For good or bad, these and many other instances illustrate the contribution made by the minister to direction of policy in the shape of compelling decisions based on considerations of a kind which lie outside the scope of departmental policy, in the Transvaal case the influence of high finance in the City and the Rand on the Government, in the case of Palestine the influence of the Zionist movement, strengthened no doubt later on by the hope that the creation of a Jewish régime in that area would constitute a valuable reinforcement of British power in the Mediterranean.

(g) See Taylor, Brentford, pp. 163 ff. Mr. Joynson-Hicks, as Home Secretary, had long enough to make good. The return of Lord Morley to the India Office temporarily, vice Lord Crewe, who was ill, was awkward for the Council and staff, who had minuted against his views after his withdrawal in 1910: Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 438.

(h) Cf. Hall, Colonial Office, pp. 53, 84, 85.

(i) Dugdale, ii. 213 ff.

In the case of India, again it is reasonable to suppose, as all the evidence available suggests, that the minister led the way in the matter of progress towards reform of government, and that the development was more rapid than would have been approved, and not on the lines which would have been suggested by the Council of India or the permanent staff (k). In such cases, of course, the inevitable tendency is in further appointments and promotions to select men whose views are likely to march with those of the minister, just as in India, when the reform scheme had been determined upon, appointments were most properly made with due regard to this consideration. There is patently nothing wrong in such action; a ministry which has a policy is fully entitled to select for advancement those who show readiness not merely to carry it out, but to do so in full sympathy. In like manner, movements of heads of departments may be inevitable, if the minister feels that he is constantly meeting with tacit obstruction, for the work in Parliament of a minister is so difficult that he must not have to contend with a reluctant office. It is, of course, plainly the duty of the permanent staff to accept loyally the new views of ministers. On a change of government, no doubt, this is not easy for men devoted to the former régime to carry out, and no doubt both the Liberal régime of 1905, which followed on a prolonged period of Conservative rule, and the first Labour Government of 1924 had some trouble owing to lack of cordial support by their offices. But a really sound civil servant will adapt himself to circumstances, as did Sir Robert Morant (l), when in 1906 he was concerned with the bill by which the Liberal Government sought—vainly as it proved through the resistance of the House of Lords—to undo part of the injustice done in the Education Act of 1902 for which that officer was very largely responsible.

(k) This appears clearly from Mr. Montagu's Diary.

At the present day the duty of civil servants to advise on issues, as opposed to the mere presentation of facts and arguments for and against any course, is beyond question. It can be seen from the information published regarding the Colonial Office (m) that the practice was recognised early in the Victorian epoch, but in the Foreign Office, Lord Salisbury quite patently had no desire whatever to be advised by civil servants, and it was only after full consideration of the practice of other offices including the Colonial Office, that there was adopted the common sense rule that papers go to the minister with advice so far, of course, as that lies within the scope of a department (n). Departments, of course, have traditional points of view, many of which can be seen in the proceedings of the Colonial Office. The Dominions

(l) For the bill, see Lee, Edward VII., ii. 455 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 63 ff. For an indiscretion of Morant in 1912, see Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, p. 488.

(m) H. Hall, Colonial Office.

(n) Tilley and Gazelee, Foreign Office.

Office, in the tradition of the Colonial Office, may be safely assumed to favour the two doctrines of concession of any demand made by a Dominion Government (o), and reluctance to take any step which can be represented in any way as putting pressure on a Dominion Government. The pre-war Treasury was finally bound to the support of the policies of Sir R. Peel and Mr. Gladstone (p), and it maintained this attitude after the war until it was inevitably modified to meet the change of views on the part of the ministry. There is a widespread belief, encouraged by the publication of a mass of Foreign Office minutes in the post-war disclosures of the trend of governmental policy, that the Foreign Office staff, especially Sir Eyre Crowe, looked with special favour on close co-operation with France, and therefore was hostile to projects for closer co-operation with Germany as apt to injure the principle of working with France.

But it is not in the relations of civil servants to ministers that difficulties as to loyalty arise (q). No one supposes that the Colonial Office officials of Conservative habit of mind had any desire in 1905 to thwart the policy of the new ministry as regards South Africa, still less that they would have in any way encouraged the opposition in resistance to it; such an attitude of mind was inconceivable to them. It is different with some military officers as Sir H. Wilson's Diaries expose with distressing clarity. He gives with naive pride, proof that from 1912—14, when serving on the War Office staff, he was in frequent touch with opposition leaders, both as regards the crusade for conscription repudiated by his department (r), and as regards the attitude of officers of the army to the Home Rule question and the possible need of enforcing it by movement of troops (s). Moreover, he asked (o) E.g., as to the native territories in South Africa.

(p) Cf. Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 611 (Sir F. Mowatt).

(q) For Sir E. Grey's difficulties with Sir A. Nicolson due to the extraneous issue of Ulster, see Nicolson, Carnock, pp. 401 f.

(r) Callwell, Wilson, i. 131, 138, 140 f.

(s) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 40 f.; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 624, 626, 628, 630.

the opposition leaders to urge the Government to enter into war, and to send the expeditionary force over to France (t). In the same spirit of frank disloyalty he took the opportunity, when on leave from France, of seeing opposition leaders and the editor of the Morning Post (u), and naturally played his part in the intrigues which brought about the fall of the first coalition Government in 1916. His subsequent career, now as working with, now as working against, Mr. Lloyd George (x), is candidly set out in his own narrative, with complete indifference to elementary considerations of what most men deem honourable conduct, and it must be feared that this activity had not even the redeeming merit of having in any way advanced the interests of Britain, though one must believe that he genuinely thought that he was justified in conduct, prima facie unscrupulous, by the public interest.

Unhappily for his reputation, the Life of Lord Ypres reveals him in a less obviously discreditable, but still unsatisfactory light. It is a minor matter that, when commanding at Aldershot, he used his friendship with Lord Esher to induce the Secretary of State to prefer his advice to that of the Army Council; instances of this sort of thing are not, it is understood, infrequent (y). But it is clear that he acted disloyally to the ministry under which he served in giving information to the correspondent of The Times after the second battle of Ypres, and in sending home staff officers to interview Conservative leaders (z). This deliberate attack on his political chiefs may be explained charitably by deep conviction that the Government had failed to supply the necessary munitions, and had thus injured the cause of the (t) Callwell, Wilson, i. 156.

(u) Callwell, i. 200 f.; for 1916, pp. 298 f.

(x) For his intrigue against Haig and his disloyalty to the Premier, see Duff Cooper, ii. 300, 328, 329; for his complete failure to understand the military position in July, 1918, pp. 326 f.

(y) French, Ypres, p. 140.

(z) The exposure of Lord French in Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 141—151, is crushing in its citation of his letter to the Premier of 17th May, 1915; he, no doubt, desired to excuse his own grave errors: Beaverbrook, Politicians and the War, i. 90 ff.

country; it cannot be excused, and his conduct contrasts painfully with the absolute loyalty shown by Sir D. Haig to the ministry despite the foolish intrigues which were used in the hope of driving him from office. He saw well what was desired, but, convinced as he was rightly, that he was bound to maintain his post unless deliberately removed thence (a), he made no effort to retaliate, even when he could have furnished conclusive evidence to destroy the claim of Mr. Lloyd George that he had not failed to provide necessary reinforcements.

A minister, of course, owes no obligation to his subordinates in his department not to go outside for advice, and still less is he bound to follow the advice of his highest officers. In civil business the minister is clearly not bound to acquiesce in only such advice being put before him as the head of his staff approves; the best practice supplies him with the judgments of several officers, and, though the practice of writing minutes to order is not unknown, a competent minister can easily counteract it, as did Mr. Lloyd George. A complaisant minister, of course, will not bother to investigate for himself, or to read long minutes of discrepant character, and he may acquire the habit of simply taking what his private secretary sums up for him. In defence issues there is a more serious difficulty, in that while civil officers are not required by the rules of the service to subordinate their opinions to those of their seniors, there is much reluctance on the part of subordinate officers, even of high rank, to criticise the decisions of high commanding officers. Hence during the war it became necessary for ministers to take the otherwise distasteful step of referring to independent advisers. Thus, while Mr. Asquith invited the opinions of Lord Roberts, Lord Kitchener, and the high military commanders, in a Council of war on August 5th, 1914 (b), when in doubt whether to accept as sound the views of the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and Sir J. French, Mr. Lloyd George used Sir H. Wilson and Lord Ypres to counter that of Sir W. Robertson and Sir D. Haig (c). No objection could possibly be taken to this procedure. What can be criticised in Mr. Lloyd George is his failure to realise that in Sir W. Robertson he had a far more trustworthy guide than Sir H. Wilson, a conclusion forced upon us by the published works of the two men, and by impartial historians of the war.

(a) Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 180.

(b) Churchill, World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 231—233. On this date, after consultation with some colleagues, Mr. Asquith decided to appoint Lord Kitchener Secretary of State. See Haldane, Autobiography, pp. 277 f.

Difficult questions are presented to those departments which have to control Governors overseas, especially where there is a change of ministry and to some extent of policy. Modern practice seeks to avoid such friction as occurred in the famous instance of Sir Bartle Frere (d), by securing that telegraphic instructions are given so fully and freely as to prevent serious misunderstandings. Thus, Lord Selborne was able to remain as Governor of the Transvaal despite the advent to office of a Liberal Government. A case of friction was seen in the treatment of Lord Lloyd (e), who had to leave the office of High Commissioner for Egypt when the Labour Government of 1929 adopted a change of policy towards Egypt, which at the time in fact was premature and badly miscarried. Unfortunately the High Commissioner failed to receive from Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Baldwin, the Parliamentary defence to which his account of the proceedings showed him to be fully entitled, when Mr. Henderson unfairly tried to justify his supersession by the theory that the previous Government had been dissatisfied with his conduct of affairs. It is plain, as Lord Lloyd pointed out, that it is as proper for a new Government to make a change if it thinks it necessary as it is incumbent on a Government, which does not make a change or intimate dissatisfaction, to defend the conduct of an officer in Parliament when it is impugned. It is not now the practice lightly to change officers in the diplomatic service on a change of ministry, though exchanges of office may sometimes be promoted on this account.

(c) Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 180 f., 232.

(d) Letters, 2 s., ii. 644; iii. 22, 24 f., 64, 99, 109, 124.

(e) See Egypt since Cromer, vol. ii. (1934), ch. xviii.

Diplomats, of course, from their special position owe the changing heads of departments a distinctly difficult duty. If they have been carrying on one line of policy, to advocate another, possibly very discrepant, cannot come easily to them, and they may be forgiven if in making the change they cannot be wholly discreet in their comments to the Governments with which they deal. But the tradition is one of loyalty, though there are notorious exceptions, such as that of Lord Normanby to Lord Palmerston (f), which induced the former to help in the overthrow of the latter, who had probably given him cause for resentment by various marks of discourtesy. The question was discussed at length in 1880 (g), when the new ministry decided to make a change at Constantinople and recalled Sir A. H. Layard. The Queen naturally protested, as the minister had been active in carrying out her late Premier's policy, and she felt it objectionable to make a change merely because a change of Government had occurred. The Cabinet, however, persisted. It was pointed out by Lord Granville that Lord Derby recalled the Liberal peers who had diplomatic posts, though Lord Howard de Walden had saved his by changing his politics, and originally it was the regular practice, as regards Paris, and sometimes St. Petersburg and other Courts. For twenty years this had not been necessary, but Lord Beaconsfield had recalled Sir H. Elliot, apparently because of complaints of his lack of interest in the Christian subjects of the Porte. Lord Salisbury himself had intended to make a change, and Germany and France were hostile to his retention. He was impulsive, indiscreet, saw only one side of a question, and his attitude had been so pro-Turkish as to render him unsuitable for the Governmental policy of pressing hard for the carrying out of the terms of the Treaty of Berlin. There was also the fact that he had supplied material to the Daily Telegraph for an attack on Mr. Gladstone, and, though the Premier desired that this issue be ignored, the ministry doubted whether there could be full confidence between him and the ministry. The Queen acquiesced, but Lord Granville, to his regret, found it impossible to secure the post at Rome for Sir A. H. Layard (h). There seems no later case really comparable, though clearly a change of post may sometimes be due to political considerations.

(f) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 47—49. He was removed by Lord Granville soon after: Fitzmaurice, i. 33—35; as he was hopelessly hostile to the new régime in France. Cf. Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, iii. 441 f., 445.

(g) Letters, 2 s., ii. 92—94.

Ministers may naturally enough desire to secure in new undertakings the aid of men, whose time has been given to these questions, but who are not in the civil service. This can easily enough be arranged in the case of fresh undertakings, but it is more difficult in other cases, for the rules of the civil service require, except in a limited number of circumstances, a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners of the suitability of the person proposed for any post. The exceptions, apart from promotions of officers in the service, refer mainly to certain very high posts, filled by appointments made in the name of the Crown, or to officers transferred under Act of Parliament. But the Commissioners, though not subject to political pressure in any vulgar sense, are not unamenable to legitimate suggestion. The existence of this check, however, is doubtless one of the causes of the high standard maintained by the civil service, whose members are not subjected to the disappointment and irritation caused, for instance, in Canada (i), by the introduction over their heads of ministerial protégés of minor capacity. It would be absurd to suppose that political or purely personal influence on appointments or promotions is non-existent; there are no doubt a certain number of cases where appointments to the higher offices in departments can be explained only on some such ground (k), in view of their moderate suitability, but the grossest forms of patronage are certainly absent. In the selection of overseas Governors (l) political influence has obviously its place, but it seldom happens that it has any untoward results. An essential merit of the present system is the rule that civil servants hold office, nominally at pleasure, in fact during good behaviour, so long as even a very modest capacity is exhibited. There must be few cases, if any, where removal from the service can properly be attributed to political motives. Naturally, such considerations may have some effect in inducing ministers to encourage early retirement on pension in order to vacate posts for protégés, but civil servants regard that as an inevitable, and not very objectionable part of the system.

(h) Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 199 f. Granville's own father retired on the change of ministry in 1841.

(i) Dawson, Civil Service of Canada (1929).

Ministers, like civil servants, obviously must not risk any interference of private interest with their public duty, and that raises some difficulties. A civil servant undertakes what he knows to be a whole time occupation, and he realises from the outset the limits set upon his other activities thereby. But a minister is in office for an uncertain period, and he must remember the necessity of making a living while not in power.

The point received greater importance when the days of democracy brought forward ministers who had no inherited means to rely upon, to tide them over periods when their country was endeavouring to subsist without their services. Lord Birkenhead's case caused much embarrassment to Mr. Baldwin's Government, for he was in the habit of writing articles on many subjects at high rates of pay, and he contemplated leaving the Government if this source of income was stopped. In 1925 the matter was arranged on the basis that the Government disapproved writing articles on matters of public policy, but that he could finish his existing contract, (k) Heads of departments (e.g., the Colonial Office) are sometimes obviously placed there on such grounds. Mr. Brett's selection for the Secretaryship to the Office of Works in 1895 (Journals, i. 188, 190) was clearly of this kind.

(l) E.g., Lord Lloyd, Sir Roger Lumley, &c.

writing, of course, nothing about India, his official charge (m). In 1927 the Government reformulated its policy, as excluding any form of journalism, but as consonant with writings of a literary, historical, philosophic or scientific, or romantic character, for which there were numerous and respectable precedents (n). But a warning was given that confidential matter acquired during tenure of office should not be published without the permission of the Government of the day. On the other hand, the Government did not forbid the continuation of Mr. Churchill's treatise, The World Crisis, or the appearance in advance, in the Press, of Lord Birkenhead's articles, intended for later book publication, though Lord Birkenhead, in fact, resigned office for the sake of a commercial career, which ended abruptly by death. This rule in 1936 was applied to Mr. Duff Cooper's Haig (o). A new angle of the position was raised by the desire of Labour ministers in the National Government to expound their faith in The News Letter, that pathetic exposition of an unreal creed, and Mr. MacDonald found that this was not professional journalism, but political propaganda (p). The rule, however, of the Government in 1927 still stands as the expression of the sound principle. It is from the political point of view bad enough that ministers in office should be haunted by the ghost of their declarations in works published while in the wilderness, as in the case of Mr. MacDonald's lucubrations about India and Mr. Thomas's ideals of colonial administration, without the more insistent difficulties of contemporaneous articles.

In the interests of sound administration, it is plain that a minister should have no business appointments or directorships which might interfere with complete regard for his duties, and that he should never have any commercial dealing of a kind which may give rise to the suggestion that he is preferring

(m) 184 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1735 f.; 185 ibid. 791.

(n) 203 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 559, 839; 216 ibid. 355.

(o) 308 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1955.

(p) 274 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 352.

personal advantage to State interest. As regards directorships, the issue was considered by the Liberal Government at the same time as the difficulty caused by the acceptance of the Attorney-General of a brief for The Times in the case of Mr. Parnell, which led to the requirement that no private practice should be taken by the law officers (q). The principle was then adopted that directorships should be dormant, as regards attendance at meetings and emoluments alike, during tenure of office. In 1906 the ministry required resignation of directorships, except honorary directorships in philanthropic undertakings and directorships in private companies, where the interest of the director was similar to that of a partner in a private firm (r). The Labour Government reaffirmed the rule in application to trade union officials (s), and it now stands clearly valid. Further, a minister, who is pecuniarily interested in any way in a matter of public business, should, whether in the Cabinet or in the Commons, either refrain from taking part in the proceedings or explain clearly the character and extent of his interest; ministers, it is clear, may have holdings of shares in public companies which have Government contracts, but they should be careful not even to appear to be acting in their own interest (t). Mr. J. Chamberlain repelled a severe attack on this score in 1900 (u).

A painful instance of public doubt as to the integrity of ministers arose in 1913 in respect of investments in Marconi shares made by ministers who had knowledge of the course of negotiations then in progress with regard to the development of wireless telegraphy. While the attacks made on Mr. Lloyd George and Sir R. Isaacs were strengthened by personal feeling, it was not wholly easy for Mr. Asquith to defend the action of his colleagues. He asserted that ministers must not use official information for the private profit of themselves or friends; they must not be put in a

(q) Letters, 3 s., ii. 171.

(r) 154 Parl. Deb. 4 s., 234.

(s) 169 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 735.

(t) 198 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 85—139 (1926); 307 ibid. 727 (1935).

(u) 88 Parl. Deb. 432—447.

position to be tempted to use official influence in support of any contract in which they had an undisclosed private interest; they must not accept any kind of favour from persons seeking to enter into contractual or pecuniary or proprietary relations with the State; and they should scrupulously avoid speculative investments in securities as to which, from their special means of early or confidential information, they may have an advantage over other people in anticipating market changes. He also advocated the avoidance of any conduct which might suggest that these obligations were being violated as a rule of prudence (x). It must be added, with regret, that both among civil servants and ministers instances of neglect of these principles have occurred. The leakage of budget information through Mr. Thomas, established by the report of a judicial committee of enquiry (y) necessitated his resignation of his office and of his membership of the Commons, while a civil servant has been removed for speculation in foreign exchange, and another for negotiations with the late Sir E. Geddes, contemplating acquisition of a position of importance, on retirement from the governmental service. The motive in that case (z) seems to have been rather desire for a more important sphere of utility than private profit, but the propriety of the dismissal, after careful investigation by a committee of civil servants, was not questioned.

3. The Treasury and the Departments: Co-operation and Control.

The organisation of departments is largely due to historical considerations, wholly unconnected with logic, a fact illustrated

(x) Asquith, Memories and Reflections, i. 207 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 361—365; 54 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 391 ff., 543 ff. Cf. J. Burns' view: Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 514.

(y) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5184. He had in 1935 taken out a policy securing him a sum if a dissolution took place before January 1st, 1936, which thus placed him in an ambiguous position, even if the decision were regarded as resting with the Premier. For an innocent giving away of information, cf. Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 516.

(z) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5254, 5255 (1936).

by the miscellaneous character of the work of the Home Office, which remains in charge of various fragments of prerogative power and possesses certain statutory power for no better reason than its age. Here and there a little planning has been done, as when, on the occasion of the transformation of the Local Government Board into the Ministry of Health, some effort was made to deal on a logical basis with its powers, but the most important change was merely that which gave registration of voters to the Home Office. The creation of the Ministry of Transport permitted the transfer from the Board of Trade of miscellaneous powers regarding railways and ports, but the cut made was not quite clean. The relations between the Board of Education and the Ministry of Health are far from simple; it required in 1914 a conference under Lord Haldane to arrange for an inter-departmental committee to control the question of medical assistance to children under school age, who may be regarded as needing continuation of the services rendered as part of its maternity work by the ministry, or in their aspect as prospective members of school classes provided by the Board. The device of giving a chief medical officer in common has had a useful result in diminishing friction between the departments. It took a prolonged and unedifying contest to secure the creation of a separate Air Ministry, without which the development of air defence would have been gravely retarded; it took further contests in 1937—38 to obtain for the Admiralty control over the aircraft essentially bound up with naval defence.

Co-ordination of efforts is necessary in many cases; thus the relief of unemployment requires activity by the Ministries of Labour, Health and the Unemployment Assistance Board. The Board of Trade and the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries affect substantially by their policy the actions of the Minister of Labour. The Home Office controls approved schools, substituted for the old reformatories, though education belongs primarily to the Board of Education. The service departments urgently need co-ordination which the Committee of Imperial Defence and the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence supply. Under a decision of a Cabinet Committee of 1923 (a), a Contracts Co-ordination Committee was set up, which includes representatives also of the Post Office, Office of Works, and the Treasury, and whose function it is to avoid needless waste in competition for supplies. The issue became urgent in 1937—38 with re-armament, and efforts have been made by the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence to cope with the evil of the waste of public money and delay in securing essentials. Unhappily, while co-operation between departments seems in theory obvious, the disease of departmentalism seems ineradicable, and the public interest suffers gravely from the loss of public time and the inefficiency thus arising. It is in matters of this kind that the services of a minister may be useful or the reverse. Ministers have been known who were ready at any moment to take up an issue of departmental dispute and to fight it with an energy worthy of a much better cause.

In the case of the Dominions and the Colonial Offices there is very close co-operation, because they are really a rather artificial bisection of a single office. They therefore share one building and one library, and certain of their officials do work for both, while there is interchange of staff. The Cabinet Secretariat, and the Secretariat of the Committee of Imperial Defence, were even more closely connected, and in May, 1938, were definitely linked with the Secretariat of the Economic Advisory Council under the control of the Prime Minister.

The Department of Overseas Trade occupies a special position. After energetic contentions it was placed under the joint control of the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade. The Home and the Scottish Offices control the State Management Districts Council, which deals with the State experiments in the ownership of licensed premises in England and Scotland, which are a legacy from the war. In like manner the Ministry of Health and the Department of Health for Scotland share the services of the National Insurance Joint Committee and the Therapeutic Substances Joint Committee. Such bodies as the Agricultural Research Council and the Sea Fish Commission have to serve the interests of all three parts of the United Kingdom. The matter of statistics involves co-operation by all important departments with the Permanent Consultative Committee on National Statistics in producing the Guide to Current Official Statistics (b).

(a) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 3920, p. 65. It is a sub-committee of the Imperial Defence Committee.

Of primary importance is the actual control exercised as well as co-operation given by the Treasury in respect of the other departments of State. The pre-eminence in the modern system of that department is due to the activities of Sir R. Peel as a reformer in the sphere of financial administration, and its powers steadily increased up to the outbreak of the Great War (c). They had, however, suffered a certain weakening in principle under the new régime of social expenditure, which is associated with the name of Mr. Lloyd George. Hitherto, the Treasury had been mainly engaged in seeking to limit expenditure, while assuring the adequate performance of the primary duties of a State; it was now required to find monies for social ends, which in the opinion of those who promoted them could properly make almost unlimited drafts on the resources of the State, because the interests affected transcended the mere maintenance of orderly life and supplied the instrument for a fuller life for the people. It is easy to understand the difference of outlook; when estimates for defence were narrowly scanned to secure the minimum waste, because their ends were negative if necessary, it was much more difficult to raise objections to expenditures for such obviously beneficial objects as labour exchanges, development, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, national health, housing, education, and so forth.

(b) Vol. xvi. (1937).

(c) Sir T. Heath, The Treasury; A. J. V. Durell, Parliamentary Grants; Epitome of the Reports from the Committees of Public Accounts, 1857 to 1937 (H. C. Pap. 1938, No. 154).

In the same spirit the development of humanitarian feeling leads to expenditure on a scale which would have seemed lavish on prisons, for it is no longer considered that punishment should be unpleasantly deterrent, but rather that the malefactor is a case of misadjustment to environment who should be cured rather than punished.

The functions of the Treasury are to assure the collection of the revenue, through the Boards of Customs and Inland Revenue, the Post Office, and the Commissioners of Crown lands; and to secure the imposition of new taxation and its adjustment; to control public expenditure, especially in the form of preparing the estimates or supervising their preparation; to provide the funds required from day to day for the public service, borrowing extensively for this purpose; to initiate and carry out measures affecting the public debt, currency and banking; and to prescribe the manner in which the public accounts shall be kept.

The control of the Treasury over the estimates is exercised in different forms. It has been seen that one of the rules regarding Cabinet practice is that no proposals involving expenditure shall be circulated until they have been seen by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and his consent to circulation obtained, when they will be accompanied by a memorandum setting out the implications. But that does not mean that approval of the proposals in principle carries with it all further Treasury concurrence; the Treasury still supervises details, in accordance with practice, reinforced or modified from time to time by decisions, based on reports of the Public Accounts Committee, or the Select Committee on Estimates. It is proper and desirable that any department which wishes to increase its expenditure on existing services, or to start a new service, should communicate in advance of the time for sending in estimates with a view to ascertaining the attitude of the Treasury, and equally in the case of a department desiring to spend money on works exceeding £1,000, it is requisite that the proposal should go in detail for Treasury sanction, and this even if the principle of the expenditure is already approved by the Treasury itself and Parliament. This special rule is a relic of older usage, but to judge from the number of disputed purchases made it is not clear if the plan produces much security. As regards contracts it would be impossible to apply the rules as to works; departments must comply with the general rules laid down, and must apply for sanction if deviation therefrom, as regards form of contract, omission of tenders, or so forth, is requisite. No doubt attention to these principles is of value; the South African War revealed appalling waste of money, caused by disregard of such rules of commonsense, both in Britain and South Africa, and in the buying in the Great War, where the rules could not be made effective, there was on every side wholesale waste, and inevitably bound up therewith, corruption. Further, on one issue, Treasury control is firm; questions of the number or classification of the staff of any department, or of its conditions of service are essentially to be dealt with by the Treasury, which a priori used to object to any additional staffs, and to suggest temporary expedients. Matters are now in considerable measure ameliorated by reason of the acceptance by the Treasury of the principle that expenditure of public money is not prima facie an evil thing (d).

The estimates which are presented to Parliament cover all the sums which that body is to be asked to deal with by the Appropriation Act, as opposed to those sums which are by existing Acts charged on the Consolidated Fund, and therefore need not be voted; the latter include one enormous sum, the cost of the management of and interest on the public debt, a substantial sum for Northern Ireland, the royal civil list, the salaries of judges, of the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and of some other officers and a few other miscellaneous charges, such as the pensions of ex-Prime Ministers under the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937. The other estimates cover the Army, Navy, Air Force, the civil estimates, and the three great revenue collecting departments, the Boards of Inland Revenue and of Customs and Excise, and the Post Office, whose position, however, is differentiated from the others by the fact that only a fixed sum now goes automatically to the Exchequer as a contribution to general expenditure. There is a certain difference between the treatment of the estimates. Those for the services are presented by the minister in charge (or his subordinate if he is in the Upper House, as was the Air Minister rather stupidly in 1938), the others by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. There is unquestionably a difference in the effectiveness of Treasury criticism of service estimates, arising from the difficulty of any criticism of technical details and the control over the details of sub-heads is plainly less. The great question of total expenditure and division between the services is decided, of course, by the Cabinet after consideration of the report of the Committee of Imperial Defence on the position in regard to defence in relation to foreign policy.

(d) Contrast the former attitude to all colonial expenditure: H. L. Hall, Colonial Office, pp. 32 ff.

The estimates reach the Treasury from the departments normally in November, new issues having, as mentioned above, been disposed of in correspondence or in the Cabinet before the estimates are sent in. Control is necessarily comparatively limited; many increases in civil estimates are automatic, following on decisions already taken, e.g., old age pensions and grants for health services, but the Treasury records enable that department to raise points where in detail excess expenditure seems to be proposed. If the total of all the estimates presented proves too great, it may be necessary to ask ministers to accept reductions, and the Cabinet may have to decide if there are disputes; items which have been provisionally included with Treasury prior assent may have to be cut out and so forth. There are many possibilities of reduction in detail where it is made clear some money must be saved, for a department is often astute in changes which diminish efficiency but little, yet save cash, if it is definitely told that there must be a cut. Officials, once they know that the minister has agreed to some figure, will find out ways and means to make the necessary reduction without doing much harm to the departmental plans. It seems clear that it is much more effective for the Treasury to demand a total reduction rather than attempt itself to suggest reduction in details; Sir M. Hicks-Beach (e), who enjoyed a really terrifying reputation as a watchful guardian of the public purse, concentrated on this mode, and on his right to criticise all fresh proposals for additional expenditure, the result being that departments were reluctant to put forward proposals, in the knowledge that a refusal more or less complete would follow, and that, if the matter were to be carried further, the minister himself would have to be prepared to attack the Chancellor, whose formidable character in this regard was matched by his appearance. On the other hand, we have evidence of the tendency of ministers who knew his propensity for reducing estimates to send in draft estimates rather inflated on the sound theory that, while cuts would be made, they would be acquiesced in sufficiently to make the policy profitable.

Struggles in the Cabinet over estimates, when the influence of the Prime Minister has failed to bring appeasement, are often bitter; Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Gladstone, Sir W. Harcourt, Sir M. Hicks-Beach, Mr. Lloyd George, all suffered defeat; most amusing of all was the settlement of the struggle over the navy estimates of 1909 (f), for to the man in the street the result seemed to be that after hard fighting by the Treasury, with the aid of information supplied by the school of naval thought which did not succumb to Lord Fisher's blandishments, the Cabinet decided to fix at eight the number of Dreadnoughts as opposed to half that figure advocated by the Treasury and six claimed by the Admiralty. It may however, be gathered with considerable confidence that under recent conditions the Treasury has little of its former energy to control expenditure, though probably economy in small things is yet possible. War conditions produced a change of outlook which led to the amazing experiment of the bounty of wheat production which proved so hopelessly expensive that it had at the cost of a clear breach of faith with the farmers to be abandoned outright.

(e) See Lady V. Hicks-Beach's Life (1932), ii. 151, 178 f.

(f) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 252 f. Mr. Churchill was opposed then. In 1913—14, with Mr. Asquith's aid, he carried his programme against Mr. Lloyd George after discussion in fourteen Cabinets: World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 172—178; Spender, ii. 73—75.

Control over the expenditure of the sums voted or other expenditure is shared by the Treasury with the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and ex post facto the Committee of Public Accounts. The Parliamentary grants are placed at the disposal of the Treasury by a royal order signed by the King, and countersigned by two Lords of the Treasury (g). The issue of sums from the Consolidated Fund Account at the Bank of England is authorised by the Comptroller and Auditor-General after a requisition has been made to him by the Treasury, and the Treasury then instructs the bank to what account the sums approved shall be placed in its books. The duty of the Comptroller and Auditor-General is to satisfy himself that funds have been duly voted, and he maintains an effective audit which is directed to ascertaining that sums are applied only as approved by Parliament, in which duty he is entitled to the fullest support of the accounting officers for each department, who are personally and pecuniarily responsible for irregularities, unless a protest has been duly made to the minister and overruled; in such a case the accounting officer—in most cases the head of the department—can communicate his protest to the Treasury and the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

It is obvious that, if Parliamentary control is to be formally possible, the House of Commons must have before it full details of the proposed expenditure. Estimates therefore are submitted in votes, with sub-heads, and items therein. While one vote may cover the needs of a civil department, the service estimates are divided up into a number of votes. The necessary expenditure for each year has to be provided in part before the financial year begins on April 1st, so that a Consolidated Fund Act must be passed before that date to permit expenditure for a period of some months (h) on the various services. Other such Acts may become necessary to carry on until the close of the session sees the passing of the Appropriation Act. That Act serves to appropriate to the purposes approved by the House of Commons in Committee of Supply all the sums granted since the last Appropriation Act, either to cover supplementary estimates for the preceding year, or those provided for the current year, whether by the earlier Consolidated Fund Act, or Acts, or by the Appropriation Act itself, which deals with the major portion of the expenditure for the year. But in the Act the sub-heads and items are not given, so that expenditure which does not fall outside the total of a vote is not illegal. But it is clearly not desirable that there should be any wide departure from the estimates laid before Parliament, on the strength of which, in theory, the vote has been accepted by the Commons, and still less is it desirable that a department should be tempted to spend money at its discretion without Treasury control. Hence, while the Treasury has authority to permit virement, that is transfer between sub-heads, without ratification by Parliament, the action of the Treasury is itself limited by principles which the Committee of Public Accounts has approved. A new service, or the extension of an existing service, necessitating a new sub-head to be opened, or an existing sub-head to be exceeded, will be sanctioned only if the Treasury does not feel that the amount or nature of the service is such as to render Parliamentary approval proper, and any large item or important new work would clearly not deserve approval. It expects in every case that expenditure should not be incurred prior to the grant of permission, and it may refer the issue to Committee of Public Accounts for an opinion before action. Though the Treasury can decide the issue, it must be remembered that the matter may be reported by the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and criticised by the Committee of Public Accounts.

(g) See Anson, The Crown (ed. Anson), ii. 181 ff.; Hilton Young, System of National Finance.

(h) Usually four and a half.

As regards items within a sub-head, Treasury control is less strict, but it extends to any increase of an establishment, of salary, or of cost of a service, or to any additional works or new services which have not been specifically provided for in Parliamentary grants. This rule serves the double purpose of maintaining the Treasury control over salaries and establishment, and of preventing the effort to evade Treasury control by treating as items matters which should be placed as new sub-heads.

In the case of the army, naval and air estimates, which are divided into several votes, the powers of the Treasury extend to permitting transfer between votes, so that any surplus realised on one vote, whether by under-spending, or by extra receipts beyond those allowed for as appropriations in aid (i.e., payments made in respect of services rendered by the department), may be applied to make up deficiencies in such appropriations in another vote, or to defray expenditure not provided for, postponement of which might be detrimental to the public service. But this power is temporary; the appropriation accounts presented to Parliament of the expenditure of the current year in which transfers have been sanctioned must be accompanied by a statement showing the transfers and the reason for their being made, and the necessary approval must be obtained from the Committee of Supply, and confirmed in the Appropriation Act. Moreover, the Comptroller and Auditor-General reports in the normal manner on these sanctions to the Public Accounts Committee. Nor is sanction lightly given; if it is deliberately proposed to over-spend, sanction should be asked for in advance; if over-expenditure is incurred without previous intention, it should be reported as soon as the excess is realised. Excesses, it must be remembered, are hard to avoid when a department has many distant spending agencies, whose accounts take time to come in.

If it proves impossible for a department to meet its expenditure from a vote or sub-head in the case of those which have but one vote, and virement is not possible, either for lack of funds, or because the Treasury feels that the case is not appropriate for such procedure, there must be a supplementary estimate, and the Treasury, which dislikes such estimates, since inter alia they may interfere with the surplus which it would like to show, can insist on having full explanations made of the necessity. Such estimates are drawn up like ordinary estimates, showing the excess on any sub-head, thus permitting full examination by Parliament if desired. If after the close of the financial year an excess is discovered, it has to be provided for by an excess vote, which is duly included in the next Appropriation Act.

Naturally in war it is impossible to insist on proper Treasury control, and a vote of credit is asked for, without detailed estimates. In the Great War the Treasury asked departments to submit estimates to it, but not to Parliament (i), and certain measure of authority was given by placing the votes at its disposal. In peace the Treasury cannot control grants in aid, if placed under a department to expend without liability to surrender any balance, nor can it prevent departments taking action, which may result later in inevitable expenditure, provided that it is not immediately necessary.

Treasury control of expenditure is clearly, taken in conjunction with the work of the Audit Department and the Public Accounts Committee, effective in seeing that the formal rules of expenditure are respected. It is, of course, clear that the Treasury has not the necessary means or authority to secure that expenditure is well directed, or even that the most economical and effective use is made of the sums provided for the departments in the estimates. But no method to secure this result in a reasonably practical manner has yet been suggested. The Geddes Committee on Public Expenditure (k) in recommending miscellaneous economies failed on the whole to show any general principle to guide to more satisfactory results, and the total outcome of consideration of estimates selected year by year by the Select Committee set up in the Commons is not impressive. Moreover, the House of Commons cannot be said to take any real interest in economy of any kind. Reports by the Public Accounts Committee may contain important material, but the Commons would not dream of discussing them, and they serve essentially as texts upon which the Treasury may deliver homilies to erring departments with an authority which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not assume without the risk of causing needless irritation and friction.

(i) H. C. Paper, 1932—33, No. 140, p. xii.

Cases may arise where no provision exists for meeting expenditure and sums are immediately needed. The Treasury has for such cases the Civil Contingencies Fund, but sums so defrayed must be duly approved by the House of Commons, and it must authorise the reimbursement of the fund. This should, it appears, be carried out without undue delay. It is clear, of course, that by this means the control of the Commons may be reduced to a mere farce, as when the Codex Sinaiticus (l) was acquired for the nation, with the aid of a payment, thus in part defrayed. It was duly criticised ex post facto, but the existence of the fund had relieved the ministry of the inconvenience of coming to Parliament to ask aid for a purchase, whose importance takes more imagination to appreciate than is possessed by the average taxpayer. It is a little difficult to imagine such a payment under a pre-war régime, but the Treasury naturally has changed in spirit with the times (m), and that it aims at all at economy, is probably to be explained by the fact that it has to devise the means of finding the necessary funds with which to carry on. It is, therefore, sensitive to the constant increase of demands from every side, and it is reminded of the danger of the imposition of excessive taxation by representations from industrialists. But it is significant that the plan of enormous appropriations and a loan of £400,000,000 for defence requirements placed at £1,500,000,000 in five years, has not only since been expanded, but that contemporaneously therewith social expenditure has been encouraged largely to increase (n).

(k) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 3920.

(l) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 191, n. 3.

(m) In 1899 J. Chamberlain was eager for old age pensions of 5s. at age of sixty-five, but the Treasury pronounced the cost prohibitive: Garvin, iii. 627.

In one sphere Treasury control has been retained, and has even inclined to grow stronger. The civil service (o) has been brought more effectively within the ambit of its authority, partly, no doubt, as the necessary result of the wholesale increase in size of the service with the undertaking by the State of a vast area of social work. Since 1919, the existence at the Treasury of a department charged with establishments is a sign of the new position, and establishment officers have been appointed in the departments who are in touch with the Treasury, and who co-operate ~~it~~ with it in seeking to secure the maximum efficiency without unfairness to the staffs. In 1920, the rule that the Prime Minister was interested in the appointments to the highest staff offices was reinforced, so that his consent is now required for the appointment of the permanent heads, deputy heads, principal financial officers and principal establishment officers (p). The Permanent Secretary to the Treasury is recognised as head of the civil service, and his advice is available for the guidance of the Prime Minister, and the minister in charge of the department in respect of the selection of a suitable head. Whether great success has attended the arrangement it is difficult to say. It has not prevented permanent heads abandoning the service for more lucrative work elsewhere, or the necessity arising of removing from the service the head of a department for improper conduct.

(n) See Sir J. Simon, Commons, April 26th, 1938.

(o) Report of the Royal Commission, 1927—31, Cmd. 3909, and Intr. Memoranda.

(p) 149 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1565 f.

As already noted, the Treasury exercises over the departments a considerable amount of control by reason of the fact that it determines the classes of officers to be employed therein, and the scale of salaries. The details of these estimates set out these facts, and over them the Treasury exercises real watchfulness. If a minister is dissatisfied, he must persuade the Chancellor to overrule his staff. Further, the Orders in Council, which regulate certain aspects of civil service conditions, including hours of work and leave of absence, are issued by Treasury authority, and the Treasury exercises the discretionary power to award pensions and gratuities by the Superannuation Acts without control by any Court. Regulations of general character regarding restrictions on activities of civil servants are determined, of course, after due discussion with the departmental heads, by the Treasury.

The salaries and conditions of service of many grades of civil servants are now determined by negotiation with recognised associations or failing accord by determinations of the Industrial Court; effect is given to the financial results by Treasury circulars, which are the authority for adopting the new terms, for which parliamentary authority will be obtained formally later on.

Subject to the general rules laid down by the Treasury, each department may make its own regulations, for matters relative to the civil service depend either on contract or on the royal prerogative which any minister may control. Dismissal for misconduct rests with the minister in the last resort, except, no doubt, in the case of officers appointed with the consent of the Prime Minister, when his authority would clearly be necessary (q). It is exercised in virtue of the royal prerogative, which can be limited by statute alone, to dispense with the services of any servant of the Crown (r).

(q) E.g., in 1936: Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5255.

(r) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 335

CHAPTER VI.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL AND THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE.

1. The Privy Council.

THE Cabinet remains an essentially advisory body, which determines policy, but does not carry it out. The Privy Council in early days no doubt had advisory functions, but the King in Council was the chief executive authority, and matters of high, and many even of minor consequences were disposed of by an Order of the King in Council (a). The growth of administration and the necessity of specialisation of authority has resulted in giving to the individual ministers the actual control of administration, subject to harmony with the policy set by the Cabinet, and the functions of the King in Council have been reduced. But even now the Orders of the King in Council are the mode of expressing certain matters of special importance in the sphere of prerogative, while they are the mode in which is exercised much of the delegated legislative power conferred by Parliament on the executive Government.

In the Council are performed certain important acts. On the death of the Sovereign it meets, all councillors being eligible to attend, and shares in the proclamation of the new Sovereign (b) with the Lord Mayor of London and others, and to it the King delivers his first address. Ministers take therein the oath of office, and kiss the King's hands (c), receiving thence the insignia of their offices; bishops pay homage on election for the temporalities of their sees, and sheriffs are chosen annually.

(a) Turner, The Privy Council, 1603—1784 (1927—28).

(b) December 12th, 1936; Gazette, 34349.

(c) Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman seems to have omitted this rite, 5th December, 1905: Esher, Journals, ii. 133. For the Privy Councillor's oath, see Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 153.

Orders in Council may be substantive instruments, or they may approve and authorise other instruments. Thus a proclamation of war or of neutrality is embodied in letters patent under the great seal, but it rests on an Order in Council, and the constitutions granted to colonies are issued as letters patent, but are similarly based on Orders in Council. Similar procedure applies to the grant of a charter to an university or to a municipality, to a dissolution and summons of Parliament, a declaration of emergency under the Emergency Powers Act, 1920, or a coinage proclamation under the Coinage Acts. There is no essential distinction between a constitution granted to a ceded colony and that provided for a protectorate. But the latter, which is made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890, stands by itself as an Order in Council, and is not embodied in letters patent. Regulation of the civil service in matters of high importance is regularly expressed by Orders in Council.

The Council in passing Orders consists of the King and not less than three councillors, four being usually summoned. It is noteworthy that none of these need be ministers of the Crown, though, when important business is to be disposed of, it is natural that the responsible minister should be summoned, in case the King may desire before the Council to have anything explained. In the case where the King expresses approval of the marriage of a more distant member of the royal family under the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, it is not unnatural that the councillors summoned should be members of the royal family (d). Orders are not signed by the King; their authenticity is established by the signature of the clerk of the Council or his deputy, and by the seal of the Council. A record is kept of the names of those present (e).

(d) For Princess Mary's marriage the Prime Minister, Lord Chancellor, Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chamberlain and Home Secretary were summoned in 1921: Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 767; the Lord President also in 1923 for the Duke of York: ii. 794.

Every Order in Council on official business is based on the advice of a department of State; thus, the Home Secretary secures the passing of orders as to aliens, the Secretary of State for Air orders regarding air navigation, the Board of Trade orders on trade, and so on. In certain cases committees are provided for, whose activities are the sole relic of the former consultative functions of the Council. There are committees to deal with statutes of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, with those of the Scottish Universities, with applications for municipal charters, with constitutional affairs in the Channel Islands, and with the baronetage, thus enabling an effective register to be kept of those entitled to recognition as possessed of that rank. The Privy Council has also certain duties in respect of the administration of the Medical, Pharmacy, Veterinary Surgeons, Nurses Registration, Architects' Registration, and Dentists' Acts, which bring it into contact with the General Medical Council, the Medical Research Council, the Pharmaceutical Society, the Dental Board, &c., and important functions in respect of the right of medical practice, both in India and the United Kingdom are conferred by the Government of India and the Government of Burma Acts, 1935. The duty of administering the oaths of office to the Regent is conferred on it by the Regency Act, 1937.

But the substantial work of the Council has been absorbed by the Secretaries of State; the Committee of Council for Trade and Plantations still exists in law, but the work is done by the President and Secretary of the Board of Trade. The Committee of Council for Education yielded to a Board in 1899. Powers in respect of health and agriculture are now in the hands of ministers. The Committee of Council for Scientific and Industrial Research has been transformed into a department for which the Lord President remains responsible. It has control over the Geological Survey, the National Physical Laboratory, and other research bodies, and there is an advisory council.

(e) Modern usage requires the presence of the King, or a formally authorised representative (e.g., the Prince of Wales); cf. the less regular older usage; Turner, Privy Council, 1603–1784, ii. 40–43, 93 f.; and contrast the Guernsey Order in Council case in 1845: Greville, Memoirs, 1837–52, ii. 292–294. On the other hand, the sovereign cannot now be present for debates in committees of Council: cf. Lord Granville in 1864; 175 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 251.

The power to act by Order in Council, whether statutory or prerogative, exempts the ministry from immediate control by Parliament. This is, at times, of paramount importance, as in the case of the decision to grant responsible government to the Transvaal (f) by such an order approving letters patent, because to carry through the House of Lords an Act to this effect would have proved impossible. It is true that it was a strong step to take (the writer first suggested its possibility), but had the feud with the Boers not thus been stayed, the outbreak of war in 1914 would have seen a rebellion on a scale quite beyond the power of the troops which were maintained in the territories to subdue. The same remark, though with less force, applies to other exercises of prerogative power, such as the Orders in Council determining the functions of the Admiralty Board and Army Council (g); the most remarkable case, however, concerned the issue of a warrant in 1870 (h) under statutory power regarding the system of purchase of army commissions. It was thus possible to effect, with the sanction of the Queen, a reform which the House of Lords had deliberately, but very unwisely, refused to accept.

2. The Lord Chancellor.

The position of the Lord Chancellor is one of the many anomalies of the constitution. He presides in the House of (f) Lee, Edward VII., n. 481 ff. The Lords would have rejected a bill at once: all the Conservative leaders were violently opposed, but the biographer of Balfour and Sir A. Chamberlain in Politics from Inside are discreetly silent. Cf. Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 27 ff.

(g) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 238 ff. On the Navy Board issue as to the control of the First Sea Lord over the Board, see Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 192 f.

(h) Letters, 2 s., ii. 147, 151—154; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 361—365.

Lords, of which he is regularly made a full member by the conferment of a peerage, is a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the Supreme Court of Justice, where Lord Birkenhead sometimes gave assistance in the Court of Divorce. He recommends the appointment of puisne judges of the High Court, is responsible for the appointment and removal of justices of the peace, acting in the former case, with the aid of the Lord Lieutenants and their advisory councils, and for the removal of coroners. In these cases his action is taken without specific royal approval, though it is clear that a Secretary of State could give directions for the insertion in or exclusion from the commission of any given name. By statute he acts without express royal authority in appointing and removing County Court judges, and in presenting to livings in the hands of the Crown valued at £20, or less, temp. Henry VIII., but where the livings are of higher value the Prime Minister takes formally the royal pleasure. He controls, through the County Courts Department, the administrative side of the work of these Courts, but his functions in respect of the central office of the Royal Courts of Justice are limited by the authority assigned to the judges. He is a member of the Rule Committee of the Supreme Court, and confirms those made by the County Courts Rule Committee. He controls the Land Registry Office and the office of the Public Trustee, and has functions of various kinds in respect of pensions appeals and other administrative tribunals.

The Chancellor owes his position, as a member of the Privy Council and the Cabinet, to his historical connection with the Great Seal, which is essentially in his custody, and to which he becomes, by custom, entitled, when on the accession of a new Sovereign the old seal is defaced and replaced by a new one. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is responsible for this aspect of the Chancellor's functions, and in his office the sealing is normally carried out. This office is ancient, and its occupant, who is appointed by sign manual warrant is "the first esquire and first clerk of England." Writs for the elections of members of the Commons pass through his office; he receives and lists the returns, attends in Parliament to read the titles of the Bills to which assent is pronounced by the Clerk of the Parliaments on the authority of the royal commission; he attends at the Court, where the judges, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, sit to select those who are to be chosen as sheriffs, and to have their names formally pricked by the King in Council (i). He authenticates by his signature documents bearing the great seal, showing that they have been duly authorised by warrants properly countersigned. But powers to treat, and ratifications of treaties, do not now pass through his office, though formerly they were both prepared and enrolled in chancery.

The Chancellor is Chancellor of that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, and in this capacity controls even Scottish justices of the peace. He appears still to be subject to the rule that he must not be a Roman Catholic, and, no doubt, he may not be a Jew by religion. In his absence from the United Kingdom his powers are appointed to be exercised under a commission by such persons as may be thought fit, and this has recently been recorded in Lord Hailsham's absence overseas.

The anomaly of a judge, who is also a Cabinet minister, is palpable, nor is it lessened by the fact that, until the appointment of Lord Maugham in March, 1938, a Lord Chancellor was regularly an ex-politician of strong party leanings. The fact that he does not preside over State trials removes part of the objection to the position, but the fact remains that he may preside in cases involving important constitutional issues in the case of the United Kingdom or the Dominions in which the Government may have a definite political interest. It can hardly be said to have conduced to respect for the decision on the relations of the Courts to martial law in the Marais

(i) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 38.

Case (k), that the decision, excluding their intervention, was obviously of great value to the British Government. Other cases, no doubt less open to criticism, may be cited. The argument for a separation of judicial and political functions is strong, but inertia naturally has so far precluded the carrying out of the project that a Minister of Justice should replace the Lord Chancellor in the sphere of political and non-judicial functions (l).

3. The Lord Privy Seal.

This office, though regularly filled at the present time, is wholly without functions. The intervention of privy seal warrants was a device originally adopted to strengthen the hold of Parliament over administration by multiplying safeguards for the wise use of royal power. Thus, by Statute of 1535, it was made requisite as a preliminary to letters patent being passed under the great seal, and by Coke's time issue of the royal funds must be by authority of the great or the privy seal. Later the form remained as a fruitful source of fees. In 1884 its use disappeared for good, and the office was left to survive, because of its high precedence, which encourages its acceptance by ministers of experience, who desire relief from departmental duties, as when Lord Salisbury in 1900 took it on retirement from the Foreign Office, or by ministers deputed for special work, as Mr. Thomas in 1929 for unemployment, and Mr. Eden in 1936 for League of Nations business, though in his case, without a seat in the Cabinet, a possibility envisaged in the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, which then gives £3,000 salary.

(k) [1902] A. C. 109; Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), pp. 397 f.

(l) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 9230, p. 64 (Haldane Committee's recommendation); Ensor, Courts and Judges, pp. 97 ff.; Birkenhead, Points of View, i. 113 ff. Law reform, however, has been greatly promoted by the Law Revision Committee, appointed by the Lord Chancellor which has proposed important Acts, e.g., Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935; and see Cmd. 5334, 5449.

4. The Secretariat.

The Secretaries of State have developed from comparatively minor officials, the royal secretaries, attached to the royal household (m). Their greatness dates from the Tudors, when Sir R. Cecil served Elizabeth in this capacity; the number at the close of her reign was two, at which it remained with occasional exceptions until 1794. Early they became the channel of communication between the King and his Council, and between the King in Council and the outside world, were entrusted with important foreign negotiations and helped to decide the business to be brought before Council. But their period of greatness was after the evolution of the Cabinet system, and its development under the Hanoverians, when the Council ceased to meet under the Sovereign to discuss business. The Secretaries of State succeeded in securing recognition of their authority to give directions in lieu of merely countersigning directions signed by the Sovereign. It was an important change, and at the same time they came to control business hitherto disposed of by committees of the Council in the sphere of foreign, colonial, and domestic affairs alike. Thus, matters at one time handled by the Board of Trade, a quasi committee of the Privy Council, whose recommendations went before a formal Committee of Council, and were given effect by an Order in Council, came to be dealt with by the Secretary of State. He thus stood out as a very important member of the Cabinet.

A formal distinction of the functions, hitherto divided in practice by geographical distribution, as appertaining to the Northern and Southern departments, was made by Fox in 1782, and the Foreign Secretary was thus differentiated from the Secretary for Domestic Affairs and the Colonies, who controlled also certain matters affecting the army. In 1794, the Napoleonic war made necessary a new office, to control the war operations, and in 1801 the colonies were transferred to its sphere. The Crimean War rendered a separate Secretary of State for War necessary in 1854, who superseded the former Secretary at War and other authorities. The assumption of direct control over India resulted in the creation of a Secretary of State for India in 1858, the Great War produced the Secretary of State for Air in 1918. The new status of the Dominions resulted in the creation in 1925 of a Secretaryship, though distinct appointments thereto were postponed until 1930, and in 1926 the Secretary for Scotland was raised to the status of a Secretary of State. Finally, the separation of India and Burma, under Acts of 1935, resulted in the creation of a ninth Secretaryship of State, but it is likely to be held by the Secretary for India, as a matter of practical convenience, economy, and efficiency.

(m) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 173 ff.

All these officers are appointed under the prerogative, though there are statutes dealing with their functions in certain cases. Each can act for another, which proves convenient when one is absent, as when the Colonial or Indian Secretary goes overseas. The form of appointment is the handing of the seals in Council; each is given the seal, the signet, and the cachet seal, though the last is only used in the Foreign Department. The signet is used on sign manual warrants authorising the issue of full powers and ratifications in the Foreign Office, and is affixed to commissions of Governors-General and Governors and to royal instructions, in the Dominions, Colonial, India and Burma Offices. The seal of the department is used for royal warrants and commissions countersigned by a Secretary of State.

5. The Secretary of State for Home Affairs.

The Home Secretary is in a sense the representative of the Secretariat in its relation to the Crown, and various prerogative functions are exercised through him, while rather miscellaneous statutory duties have been assigned to him in default of any more suitable department (n).

(n) Sir E. Troup, The Home Office; Taylor, Brentford, pp. 172—221.

He is the minister who is in attendance on the occasion of a birth of a royal child, or the death of the Sovereign, and he notifies certain State events to the Lord Mayor of London and the governors of the outlying parts of the British Islands. Official functions, in which the King participates, are arranged on his responsibility (save where they affect Dominion Governments), and he is the channel of communications between the public, and public bodies of all kinds, and the King. He is responsible for the submission to the King, and counter-signature of such instruments as are not specifically assigned to other departments; he thus issues the warrants for letters patent conferring peerages, and the roll of the baronetage is kept in his department. The formal procedure as regards appointment of royal commissions passes through his hands. He is the channel of communication between the King and the Church of England, is responsible for the meeting of the Convocations, and the royal approval of canons, and for part of the formal procedure for creating archbishops and bishops.

Petitions from subjects are submitted to the King through him, and under the Petitions of Right Act, 1860, it is he who, after consulting the department concerned in any claim made by a subject in respect of sums due under proprietary rights or contracts, and the Attorney-General, advises the King whether the petition should be endorsed, "Let right be done." If this is approved, the petition is sent to the department impugned for answer, and the matter then proceeds on the lines of an ordinary action.

He is responsible for the control exercised over Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, and for relations with their Governor and Lieutenant-Governors, whose instruments of appointment are in his responsibility.

His functions as regards the maintenance of order are comprehensive. The Metropolitan Police Force is under his control, and he has through his inspectors considerable authority over county and borough police forces, in virtue, in part, of direct statutory power of regulation, in part through the power to withhold the payments authorised by Parliament, if the forces are not maintained to his satisfaction. He further appoints police magistrates in the metropolis, recommends the grant to boroughs of a separate commission of peace, as distinct from the county commission, or of a separate Court of quarter sessions, and submits the recorder who holds the Court. He acts similarly as regards stipendiary magistrates for boroughs. He, with the aid of a Prisons Commission, deals with prisons and convict establishments, controls asylums for the reception of criminal lunatics, and approved schools—replacing reformatories and industrial schools—for the correction of juvenile offenders.

He advises the Crown as to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, the remission or modification of punishments due under law. The prerogative applies to offences of a public character, but, save where specially provided by statute, it cannot be used to affect private rights, such as the bringing of a civil suit or a claim for a penalty. It cannot authorise the committing of a crime, and by statute an impeachment cannot be prevented by a pardon, though a pardon can be granted thereafter; in other cases, as in those of accomplices pardoned on any ground it may be conferred before conviction. A pardon wipes out the crime, and thus removes disqualifications, which service of the sentence would not affect. The exercise of the prerogative may be by way of reprieve, which a judge may also grant, a commutation, or pardon; a sign manual warrant now suffices in lieu of letters patent. The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, permits the Secretary of State to refer any case for the opinion of the Court.

The Secretary of State has authority in matters aimed at securing public safety. He grants, at discretion, under the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, certificates of naturalisation, and under the Amending Act of 1918 has authority in various cases to cancel such certificates. He administers—in 1936—37 very partially—the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870; the Extradition Acts, 1870—1932, which secure the handing over of foreign criminals and the reception of criminals of domestic origin; and the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881. The protection of the rights of diplomatic representatives of foreign States (o) is by statute his obligation.

He may call upon the military, naval or air forces to aid the civil authorities in case of rioting, and his authority is requisite for the movement of troops (p) when requisitioned by local authorities in case of urgent danger. He is responsible for the putting in motion of certain powers under the Emergency Powers Act, 1920. He can authorise detention and opening of letters and telegrams in the Post Office (q), and can control the use of telegraphs, and authorise taking possession of railways and tramways. The vast business of air-raid precautions is under his care, and is managed by a new department, which involves very close relations with the local authorities throughout the United Kingdom (r).

He authorises prosecutions of foreigners under the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878, and is the authority to declare the extent of jurisdiction claimed, e.g., in the Bristol Channel, by the Crown (s).

The ancient power of the King to forbid the departure of a subject from the realm is exercised by him through the writ ne exeat regno, now in practice confined to the case of absconding debtors.

The Home Secretary has also duties in respect of control of vivisection; of burials and cremation; of theatres and cinematographs; of petroleum; of habitual drunkards and lunatics; of safeguarding children, whom it is proposed to (o) For the raid on the premises of Arcos, Ltd., in 1927, see Taylor, Brentford, pp. 236—239.

(p) Cf. their use in the London Dock Strike in 1926; Taylor, pp. 198 f.

(q) A general warrant to open letters, &c., was signed by Mr. Churchill in 1911; World Crisis, 1911—14, p. 52.

(r) The Home Secretary shares in the secret service fund, now (1938—39) fixed at £450,000, with the Foreign Office and ministries for defence.

(s) The Fagernes, [1927] P. 311.

send abroad for entertainment purposes; and of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors. He deals also with certain matters affecting the health and safety of those engaged in trade, as in the Factory Acts, the Explosive Substances Act, and the limitation of the employment of young persons and children. A department of the Home Office is largely engaged with matters affecting the interests of children, and much has been done through the activities of the Home Office to secure that in judicial matters they shall be dealt with by special Courts, with a definite aim to the early reformation of character, while every encouragement is given to organised efforts by societies of all kinds to provide facilities for the healthy exercise of the faculties of children in a manner to render their falling into criminal practices unlikely. The Home Office is also deeply concerned in the suitability of the educational and other treatment given to children, who are sent to approved schools in order to remove them from unsatisfactory surroundings. The administration of the Acts for the preservation of wild birds is also given to the Home Office, and, after the Local Government Board was transformed into the Ministry of Health, the work regarding elections and the registration of electors was taken over by the Home Office, which plainly was the more suitable authority. It has also some connection with the Racecourse Betting Control Board, as the result of the decision of the Government to permit the operation of totalisators (t).

The Home Secretary has a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, a Permanent Under-Secretary, and a large staff.

6. The Secretary of State for Scotland.

Though of recent origin this office may here be noted, as its functions cover some of those dealt with by the Home Office. From the union of the Parliaments to 1746, Scotland was represented by a Secretary of State, but thereafter her business was dealt with in the Southern department, later the Home Office, and only in 1885 was a new ministry, the Secretaryship for Scotland, created, to undertake the work done by the Home Office under forty-five Acts and amendments thereof, by the Privy Council, as regards manufactures and education and health, and certain duties of the Treasury and Local Government Board. He was given custody of the Great Seal of Scotland, and his appointment, originally by sign manual warrant, was conferred by transfer of the seal from 1892. In 1926 he was raised to the status of a Secretary of State (u) with a Parliamentary Under-Secretary.

(t) Racecourse Betting Act, 1928.

Prior to 1928, the administration of Scottish affairs was largely in the hands of Boards, but this plan, which was not unpopular in Scotland, was disliked by the minister, who preferred the full power which is exercised over departments, and the Boards of Agriculture, Education, and Health were therefore replaced by departments. The Scottish Education Department is, as a remnant of early history, in theory controlled by a Committee of the Privy Council, but the Secretary is vice-president, and sole authority. The Department of Health controls the General Register Department, and the General Board of Control, and the Scottish Office the Prison Commission, while it shares with the Home Office control of the State Management Districts. There is a Fishery Board associated with the Department of Agriculture, which has an advisory committee for allotments, and shares with the English Ministry of Agriculture the services of the Sea Fish Commission. Similarly, the Department of Health shares with the ministry the services of the National Health Insurance Joint Committee. The Department of Education has an Advisory Council, and all three departments bring the Scottish Office in touch with local government.

As the result of repeated protests in Scotland the policy of concentrating staff in Edinburgh has been adopted, and large offices are under construction, in an effort to minimise the delay and cost involved in having the heart of the Scottish administration situated in London. The fact that the Secretary of State is necessarily much engaged there is one of numerous causes, resulting in the gradual decay of Scottish industry and agriculture, contemporaneous with a diminution in national energy and spirit. This fact explains the attempt to develop a Scottish National Party since 1928, in order to restore a Scots Parliament, which would make head against the drift south of both industry and population, and the steadily increasing depopulation of the Highlands; it is a striking instance of the difficulties of the present system that the Caledonian Power Scheme, intended to promote the production of carbium calcide in the north, was defeated in Parliament in 1937 and 1938 by English votes, influenced by the danger of competition with a like undertaking proposed for South Wales. Short of so drastic a step, it has been suggested that the Scottish members of Parliament in the Standing Committee of the Commons should be given the duty of dealing in detail with the Scottish estimates, which now naturally receive minimal attention. But no palliative of this sort can alter the inevitable economic results of attachment of a weaker area to a stronger, a result seen clearly enough in the case of Northern England.

(u) A considerable number of matters are reserved to the Home Secretary, including naturalisation and aliens.

7. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Foreign Secretary's work has so much increased of recent years that two Under-Secretaries are allowed for his department, one especially deputed to deal with League of Nations affairs; the change in the position of the League in consequence of the failure of Britain to maintain its principles, however justifiably, must render reconsideration of this arrangement necessary. By a greater, and less defensible, anomaly, in addition to the Permanent Under-Secretary of State, there was created in 1938 a post as Chief Diplomatic Adviser to the Government and Secretary of State. It seems difficult to explain or defend the appointment, which, despite disclaimers, must lessen the authority of the Permanent Under-Secretary, and it is not surprising that the appointment should have been widely regarded as an ingenious device to get round the criticism of the Public Accounts Committee of the unnecessary number of high officials in the Foreign Department. The office, of course, is one of those which evade control by ordinary principles and remind us that patronage is not yet obsolete in the civil service. The Secretary of State shares with the Board of Trade control over the Overseas Trade Department.

The functions of the Crown in respect of foreign affairs are exercised on the advice of the Foreign Secretary. His action is necessarily concerted in large measure with the Prime Minister, and is brought under the control of the Cabinet by the regular circulation to the ministers of prints of the important despatches and telegrams received and sent on foreign affairs, thus permitting interpellations at each Cabinet meeting, as well as the discussion of general policy or detailed application thereof by the Cabinet. The difficulty, however, of appreciation of the complex interplay of such issues is shown by the rather astonishing fact that the rest of the Cabinet did not share the view of Mr. Eden and Lord Cranborne that the negotiations of 1938 with Italy were the outcome of an ultimatum from Signor Mussolini, and did not appreciate the inevitable result of this unwise effort to detach Italy from her understanding with Germany. Their attitude was speedily to involve the annexation of Austria and the imposition by an ultimatum of the will of Poland on Lithuania.

The control of Parliament over foreign policy will be discussed below. The Foreign Secretary is responsible, with the assent of the Prime Minister, for the appointment of ambassadors; he fills minor diplomatic posts, conducts correspondence with British representatives abroad, and receives communications from and replies to foreign representatives to the British Government. The formal side of this business involves much ceremonial, especially with regard to the intercourse of foreign representatives with the Sovereign. He is responsible also for the control of the consular service. It has already been noted that in the formal methods of treaty-making he plays a special part, for the instruments to negotiate treaties and to ratify treaties, which pass the great seal and bear the royal signature are issued on the authority of sign manual warrants countersigned by him.

The Foreign Secretary remains responsible for relations with the Sudan, which remains under effective British control, though the accord with Egypt of 1899 has been modified by agreements of 1936, and though the renunciation of any claim to sovereignty in virtue of the condominium established by the earlier accord was dramatically proclaimed by the omission of the territory from those enumerated in the Official Coronation Programme as connected with the Crown (x). No doubt the King's surrender of a position won by British arms in great measure was motived by the wisdom of conciliating Egypt in view of the establishment of Italy in Ethiopia, and the resulting menace to the position of Britain in the Mediterranean, the Sudan and Kenya (y).

Foreign jurisdiction in backward States has been largely reduced, surviving chiefly in China, Kashgar, Maskat, Kuwait, and Bahrein. Matters therewith connected still fall in principle within the sphere of the Foreign Office, in consultation with the India Office, as regards the position in the Persian Gulf, which has primary importance for India (z). It rests with the Secretary of State to define authoritatively, for the guidance of the Courts, the extent of such jurisdiction; a like function is exercised by the Colonial Secretary in respect of territories administered under his department (a). It also rests with him to pronounce decisively on whether any (x) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire and Foreign Affairs, 1936–37, pp. 135–137, 174.

(y) The Anglo-Italian Treaty, April 16th, 1938, is intended to lessen this danger.

(z) Hence, the Sultan of Maskat, in 1938, on visiting England, was under the care of the India Office.

(a) Ratshekedi Khama v. Ratshosa, [1931] A. C. 784; Duff Development Co. v. Government of Kelantan, [1924] A. C. 797.

person is recognised by the British Crown as having diplomatic status and privilege, and he is the proper person to declare what Sovereigns are recognised de facto or de jure by the Crown, as in the case of the position of the Emperor of Ethiopia and the Italian claim of sovereignty therein (b). Such declarations are not subject to parliamentary approval, and the Cabinet may therefore recognise a conquest or annexation of territory, however important its effect, without prior consultation, as was done in the case of the German annexation in March, 1938, of Austria, effected by the threat of military measures and accompanied by the taking possession of the country by military and air forces.

8. The Secretaries of State for Dominion Affairs and for the Colonies.

Since 1925 there has existed a distinct office of Secretary of State for Dominion affairs, with a Parliamentary Under-Secretary and a Permanent Under-Secretary, though the two offices were held by the same individual until 1930. It conducts the relations of the British Government with the Dominions, including Newfoundland, whose constitution was with its consent, put in abeyance in 1934, and with Southern Rhodesia, which is progressing rapidly towards Dominion status, being subject only in a limited degree to control in matters of native affairs. It also administers through the High Commissioner for Basutoland, the Bechuanaland Protectorate, and Swaziland, the affairs of these territories, whose transfer to the Union of South Africa has been demanded with varying degrees of insistence by the Prime Minister of the Union on the strength of the provision permitting, not requiring, transfer included in the South Africa Act, 1909, creating the Union (c). As the Union is now an independent sovereign State, claiming the rights of neutrality and secession, the natives of the territories object to compulsory detachment from the British Crown, with its doctrine of trusteeship for the natives, to the Union Crown, with its doctrine of the subordination of the welfare to the natives to that of the Europeans, and its absolute repudiation of any equality in church or State for persons with coloured skins.

(b) Hayle Selassie v. Cable and Wireless, Ltd. (1938), 54 T. L. R. 628; cf. for Spain, The Cristina (1938), ibid. 512; Keith, Juridical Review, 1938, pp. 179 ff., 184 ff.

(c) Keith, The King, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 79 ff., 85—89. See Sir G. V. Fiddes, The Dominions and Colonial Offices.

Much of the work of the Dominions Office is merely to transmit the information as to Foreign Affairs prepared by the Foreign Office, which it clearly cannot wisely edit. While it corresponds with the external departments of the Dominions, the Prime Ministers have the right of direct communication with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, as was seen in the crisis of December, 1936, regarding the abdication of the King. But it serves the purpose of submitting the views of the Dominions for Cabinet consideration, and it performs other functions as a convenient mode of centralisation of correspondence with the Dominions, while it takes a special interest in the question of emigration to the Dominions. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary presides over the Oversea Settlement Board, and the creation of a Central Committee on Oversea Settlement is contemplated.

The Dominions and Colonial Offices are in touch with a number of authorities, which represent as a rule the United Kingdom, the Dominions, and the Colonial Empire in varying degrees. These include the Imperial Economic Committee, with general advisory functions of no great effectiveness; the Imperial Shipping Committee, which is really useful; the Imperial Institute of Entomology; the Imperial Mycological Institute; the Standing Committee on Empire Forestry; the Imperial Forestry Institute; the Executive Council of Imperial Agricultural Bureaux; the Imperial Institute; the Empire Timbers Committee; the Overseas Mechanical Transport Council; the Bureau of Hygiene and Tropical Diseases, and various other bodies of value, such as the Discovery Committee.

The Secretary of State for the Colonies has the assistance of Parliamentary and Permanent Under-Secretaries of State. He controls for the Crown all the colonies not possessing responsible Government, all the protectorates, including protected States, and the British mandated territories, Tanganyika, Togoland, and the Cameroons (d); the other mandated territories of the Crown fall under Australia (New Guinea), New Zealand (Samoa), and the Union of South Africa (South-West Africa), while Nauru, assigned to the British Empire, eo nomine is administered under Australian control. His authority rests in part on prerogative, in part on statute, and varies in extent: in the great majority of the colonies and in the protectorates, other than Sarawak and British North Borneo, and in some degree Tonga, his authority can be made to prevail, and he is therefore fully responsible, as in the case of the misgovernment of Trinidad, discussed in Parliament in March, 1938. In regard to Bahamas, Bermuda and Barbados, his control over the executive is complete, but he has only the right to negative legislation. In the mandated territories his authority is subject to the conditions of the mandates under which they are held, but within these limits is paramount. Legislatures normally exist in each territory, and elected members are now usually allowed for, but they are in no case, save the colonies above mentioned, in a majority in the Legislature, and the Governor has always power to override any objections to legislation.

The Secretary of State controls the colonial services, which have as far as possible been amalgamated, with doubtful wisdom, into one service. He is aided by various advisory bodies and controls the Crown Agents for the Colonies, who are the business agents of the Governments for all work to be done in the United Kingdom. The economies they effect for the colonies, &c., are undoubted, though unquestionably the lack of autonomy in this regard has at times disadvantages. Other work is done by the Malayan Information Agency and (d) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), pp. 436—511.

H.M.'s Eastern African Dependencies Trade and Information Office.

9. The Secretaries of State for India and Burma.

The Secretary of State for India (e) dates from 1858, when the Crown assumed full control of Indian affairs, in substitution for the East India Company, which previously had exercised authority for the Crown. The powers so transferred included not merely authority over that portion of India recognised as British territory, but also the rights acquired as regards Indian States. The Secretary of State was aided by a Council, which he had to consult, but which, except in certain matters, mainly financial, he could override. Under the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, given effect by the Government of India Act, 1919, a considerable relaxation of his responsibilities was produced by granting a measure of authority to ministries in the Indian provinces acting with responsibility to the local Legislatures, which were made mainly elective; but only under the Government of India Act, 1935, which in part took effect on April 1st, 1937, was a really wide measure of responsible government, tempered by safeguards to be exercised by the Governors, introduced into the provinces. The Council then was dissolved, and in lieu a body of advisers was substituted. At the same time a distinct office of Secretary of State for Burma was created with full control over Burma, which was given a generous measure of responsible government.

The Central Government of India is intended to give way to a federation, in which British provinces and Indian States shall be combined in a manner very unusual, and of dubious effectiveness; the motive is thus to counteract democracy in the provinces by the creation of strong Conservative influences in the federation. When it is effected the Indian States will fall under the federal system, in so far as they accept it for certain specified purposes, but in other matters will remain in direct relations with the Crown, advised by the Secretary of State. Those which do not accept federation will remain in direct relations. The extent of authority exercised by the Crown as paramount power is subject to definition by the Crown alone, as declared with Cabinet approval by the Viceroy in the controversy with Hyderabad in 1926. Since April 1st, 1937, the Viceroy, in his relations to the States, acts not as Governor-General, but as representative of the Crown for the purpose of its relations to the States, a distinct office from that of Governor-General under separate letters patent, though both are held under a single commission. The style of Viceroy applies to the holder of both offices without distinction of capacity.

(e) Keith, Const. Hist. of India, 1600—1935; Sir M. Seton, The India Office.

There are Parliamentary and Permanent Under-Secretaries for both the India and the Burma Offices, and advisers in both cases. Business functions are assigned to the High Commissioner for India, who acts under instructions from the Indian Government, and can also act for Burma.

The Defence Ministries.

10. The Secretaries of State for War and Air.

The modern office of Secretary of State for War (f) dates from 1854, when it emerged as the due recognition of the necessity of having a single minister to cope with the issues of war. Control of the Ordnance Board, hitherto independent, was given by statute in 1855; the Treasury relinquished control of the Commissariat, which had found the troops in food and drink, fuel and light, in December, 1854, and the office of Secretary at War, covering responsibility for finance and the regulation of the army under the Mutiny Act, was held by the Secretary of State until its duties were transferred to him in 1863. But the position of the Commander-in-Chief, who dealt with discipline and promotions, remained more or less independent, and it was only in 1870 that the subordination of that office to the Secretary of State became effectively enacted by Order in Council. The duties, however, of the Commander-in-Chief remained too considerable for the Duke of Cambridge successfully to exercise, but his relationship to the Queen delayed reform, even after the Hartington Commission had argued reform in 1890. Only in 1895 (g) was Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman able to secure the Queen's influence to compel retirement and a redistribution of duties. This proved insufficient to stand the strain of the South African War of 1899—1902, and in 1904 the recommendations of a Commission secured the adoption of the plan of having a Council on the analogy of the Admiralty Board. Under this system the Council consists of the Secretary of State, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the Financial Secretary, the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, the Adjutant-General, the Quartermaster-General, the Master-General of the Ordnance (h), and the Permanent Under-Secretary of State. All have special spheres of duty; the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is specially concerned with Territorial Army Associations and War Department Lands, while the Permanent Under-Secretary acts as Secretary, and is the channel of communication. In 1937 the Director-General of the Territorial Army was added as a military member of the Council, in view of the increased importance of that force, having regard to the important duties of home defence against air attack imposed upon it. Army policy, as defined in March, 1938, by the Secretary of State, contemplates essentially home defence, the defence of oversea territories, including naval bases, and the possible grant of aid in war to allied forces, but the stress laid on the relative rank of the purposes of the army showed conclusively that the ideal of having strong forces ready to transport to France in case of attack no longer ranks high, the suggestion no doubt being that assistance to France could best be given by aircraft in view of the fact that it has proved impossible, despite great improvement in the conditions of service, to bring the army up to normal strength, and that the reserves are inadequate.

(f) H. Gordon, The War Office (1935); Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 222 ff.

(g) Letters, 3 s., ii. 504, 509 ff., 516, 518 f.

(h) In December, 1937, the Director-General of Munitions Production, who has been a member, was made Master-General of the Ordnance also, at the same time the office of Deputy Chief of the Imperial General Staff was revived, and a Commanders' Council inaugurated to secure further preparation for war: The Times, December 3rd, 1937. On February 2nd, 1938, it was announced that a Standing Committee of the Council, including the Deputy Chief, Adjutant-General, and Quartermaster-General, and Secretary, had been created to expedite business.

The Air Ministry is essentially modern, dating from the experience of the Great War, which resulted in the creation of a distinct Secretaryship, which for a time was combined with that of war by Mr. Churchill, but now is always held by an independent minister. The Air Council was naturally created on the model of the Army Council; in July, 1938, its membership was reconstituted as the Secretary of State, the Chief of the Air Staff, the Member for Personnel, the Member for Supply and Organisation, the Member for Development and Production, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary as Vice-President, and as specially concerned with civil aviation, and the Permanent Secretary in special charge of finance. The failure to develop civil aviation resulted in 1938 in a very unfavourable report by Lord Cadman's Committee (i), and Lord Swinton contemporaneously fell under severe criticism, partly merely because his presence in the House of Lords hampered criticism, partly because it was patent that production was falling behind the necessities of defence. The Government compromised by adding to the Air Council, Earl Winterton, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in order to speak in the Commons on military aviation, while a Permanent Under-Secretary of State was created, the idea being that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary would be left free to concentrate on civil aviation. The changes evoked minimum satisfaction in the Commons, and were widely held to be an instance of the manner in which reluctance to remove a friend from office tends to prevail over the public welfare. Finally, Lord Swinton resigned in favour of Sir Kingsley Wood.

(i) House of Commons, March 15th, 1938.

The ministry is advised by the Aeronautical Research Committee. The Meteorological Office is placed under its control. It is interested in the development of air routes by Imperial Airways, but the Cadman Report was unfavourable on the subject of the attitude of that body to the ministry, though the attack was hotly assailed on its behalf as unjust. The power of the Government in this regard is derived essentially from the fact it provides the necessary subsidies to make progress possible.

11. The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are the representatives of the old office of Lord High Admiral, which has been placed by letters patent in commission ever since 1708, except for the brief period when the Duke of Clarence was given the office in 1827—28, when he had sharply to be reminded of his subjection to civil control. The Lords Commissioners in 1832 took over control of two formerly independent Boards, the Navy Board and the Victualling Board, and in 1835 the duties of the Treasurer of the Navy passed to the Paymaster-General.

The Board has been re-organised from time to time, and it now includes the First Lord, the five Sea Lords (the Deputy Chief of the Naval Staff (Air), having been given in 1938 full status as Fifth Lord), the Parliamentary and Financial Secretary, the Civil Lord, and the Permanent Secretary appointed by the Board, who issues their decisions and controls the staff. As in the case of the Army and Air Council the authority of the First Lord prevails, as he is the political head, and any decision which he determines, becomes that of the Board (k). But that raises a delicate question, for, when matters are of great importance, it is plainly open to objection that they should be debated in the Cabinet without full knowledge of the views of the Sea Lords. Hence, as the report of the Dardanelles Commission indicates, it is desirable that the First Lord should not lightly overrule the views of the Sea Lords, and it is also plain that it is quite impossible to accept the rather unreal suggestion of Lord Fisher, that he felt precluded from disclosing to the War Council his disagreement of views with Mr. Churchill. The First Lord since 1904, at least, has been given a distinctive position among the Sea Lords, which accords with his duties as Chief of the Naval Staff to deal with operations, movements of the fleet and naval staff work generally; the other Lords and Secretaries must consult him on all matters of great importance, and, though they have access to the First Lord, the First Sea Lord naturally serves as intermediary in such issues. The Board meets regularly each week, or oftener if need be. The Second Sea Lord is concerned with personnel, the Third as Controller with the supply of ships and armaments and the dockyards, the Fourth with supplies and transport, while the Deputy Chief of Staff, now Fifth Lord, is under the arrangement decided on in 1937 (l) for the control of the Fleet Air Arm by the Admiralty in due course specially concerned with air matters.

The Admiralty has certain powers as to harbours and dockyards, and its licence is requisite for construction of vessels which contravene the terms of the London Treaty of 1936. It controls the Royal Observatories, Greenwich Hospital, and the Nautical Almanac Office.

The co-ordination of defence rests with the Imperial Defence Committee under Cabinet control, and since 1936, with the Minister for the Co-ordination of Defence, whose functions have already been described. His activities have largely been directed towards encouraging the production of aircraft, with results that can only be called satisfactory by considerable optimism, but he has worked to secure the establishment of munition factories in distressed areas, especially since Parliament showed its disgust at the absurd idea of taking valuable land near Maidenhead for this purpose, having regard to the extreme vulnerability of the position and the patent objections to the further concentration of population near London. The value of the ministry is still open to dispute, and Mr. Churchill's attacks in March, 1938, on the disappointments experienced as regards realisation of promises made were cogent; to defend the position the Prime Minister was compelled to jettison Mr. Baldwin's criterion of air strength as derived from the number of first line aircraft available in Britain and Germany respectively. The inferiority of British strength to German was declared to be growing steadily, not declining, despite the great increase in estimates.

(k) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 243 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 192 ff.

(l) See also House of Commons debate, March 17th, 1938.

12. The Treasury and Subordinate Departments.

The Treasury Board represents the ancient office of Lord High Treasurer of England, which has been put in commission without exception since 1714 (m). It includes the functions of the Scots Treasury since the union of the Parliaments in 1707, and of the Irish Treasurer since 1816. As in the case of the Admiralty, the Board is constituted by letters patent from time to time as any change in personnel occurs. It consists of the First Lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and a number of junior Lords, now usually five. But the Board never meets, even formal meetings having been dropped since 1856, while the First Lord and the Chancellor had ceased attending since 1827.

The First Lord is by present usage regularly Prime Minister, and the combination of the offices is contemplated in the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937. He exercises, as such, a large and important patronage, but does not intervene in exchequer business, except as head of the Government to settle disputes between departmental heads (n), where these can be adjusted without actual reference to the Cabinet.

(m) Michael, England under George I., i. 93 f.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in addition to being a member of the Board, is appointed Chancellor and Under-Treasurer by separate patents, and by the receipt of the Exchequer Seal. His functions in respect of expenditure, taxation, and control of finance have been above referred to. His budget statement is the crowning part of his activities, as it marks the determination of the Cabinet, mainly at his guidance (o), as regards the finance of the year. The Parliamentary Secretary acts as chief whip; his former style of Patronage Secretary indicates the mode in which at one time the Commons was managed in the interests of the Government. The Financial Secretary, as already mentioned, holds a most important office, close to Cabinet rank. The junior Lords, five of whom may be paid under the Act of 1937, act as whips, but they are available to sign such documents, as by custom or law require to be signed by two Lords of the Treasury.

One relic of the former judicial activity of the Chancellor remains in the fact that he presides now in the King's Bench Division of the Royal Courts of Justice during the ancient rite of selecting the sheriffs, whose names are later pricked by the King in Council.

It is an interesting historical anomaly that the two Secretaries to the Treasury are nominally appointed by the Board, and are not directly servants of the Crown in the ordinary sense. The position of the Permanent Secretary has already been mentioned; it may be added that he advises on the delicate question of the distribution of honours to the civil staffs. The staff, if not very large, is composed of highly paid and important officials.

(n) Gardner, Harcourt, i. 570.

(o) In 1938 the budget was only submitted for Cabinet sanction just before its announcement on April 26th.

Subordinate to the Treasury are many offices of varying degrees of importance. The Paymaster-General's Office has by statute absorbed former chaotic conditions of separate departments, which yielded much profit to the family of Fox, among others less deserving still. The head has no duties, for he had delegated them to his staff, or the staff acts by customs without express delegation, but the post may be given to a junior minister as an honorary one, conferred by sign manual warrant. On the other hand, the Boards of Customs and Excise, and of Inland Revenue, which are constituted by letters patent, the chairman by warrant, are composed of civil servants. The Commissioners of Crown Lands, appointed by warrant, are in a slightly different position, for they are not merely a revenue department, but are also under the aegis of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries.

The Parliamentary Counsel's Office exists to provide for the drafting, in conjunction with departmental officers, of Governmental Bills, and the changes necessary to adapt the measures to amendments proposed or made in Parliament. The chief defect of original drafting is seen in Revenue Bills, which amend existing statutes by reference, and unfortunately the Lords of Appeal, who frequently denounce drafting, do not attempt to improve it in Parliament. Other minor offices are those of the King's Proctor, the King's Remembrancer, the Procurator-General and Treasury Solicitor, the Government Actuary, the Royal Mint, of which the Chancellor is ex officio Master, and the Central Registry Office for Friendly Societies. Other bodies dependent on the Treasury include the Development Commission, the Civil Service Commission, in some degree the Forestry Commission, the British Museum, the National Gallery and National Portrait Gallery, the Wallace Collection, the London Gazette Office, the Stationery Office, and in part the Meteorological Office. Very important functions, as to tariff making, are performed by the Import Duties Advisory Committee, and there are Committees on University Grants, on Trustee Savings Bank Investigation, and National Savings. But the Public Works Loan Commission and the National Debt Office are held not to be under Treasury control, really for technical reasons, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer has in effect sufficient authority to supervise their operations. On the other hand, the Exchequer and Audit Department may justly be said to be in essence independent, save as regards the usual control of staffs, which, however, could not be used to hamper in any way the effectiveness of the audit, even if the Treasury could be deemed capable of any action so unreasonable.

The Bank of England is only in certain aspects of its operations subject to Treasury control, but the Chancellor can, through it, deeply affect financial conditions, for example, by an embargo, recently somewhat relaxed, on purchases of foreign securities or oversea loans, and by the use of the Exchange Equalisation Fund (£375,000,000), which is employed at discretion, and subject only to examination by ex post facto by the Comptroller and Auditor-General, to prevent excessive fluctuations in exchange.

13. The Postmaster-General.

The present position of the Post Office (p) dates from 1710, when a statutory monopoly was given on the union of the Kingdoms. The office was often held by a peer, becoming definitely political from 1837, and in 1866 it was thrown open to tenure in the Commons. In 1909 provision was made for an Assistant Postmaster-General, who may be in Parliament. There is also a Post Office Board, mainly official. The Postmaster-General is appointed by letters patent, and his staff, which has been progressively modernised with considerable delegation of power of local regulation, is formidable in numbers and of varying efficiency.

The Postmaster-General has a statutory monopoly of the carriage of letters, newspapers and telegraphs; he also controls the telephone service. The issue of postal and money orders, the cash on delivery system in connection with parcel deliveries, the savings bank, and the payment of old age pensions, savings certificates and so forth, involve the handling of enormous sums of money. The United Kingdom is a member of the International Postal Union, which involves many duties on the Post Office, as does the Radiotelegraphic Convention, while negotiation of agreements for the carriage of all kinds of mail forms an important part of its work. Control by the Treasury used to be very close, but is now diminished in an important way by the agreement under which, after paying a sum of £10,750,000 to the exchequer, the balance of profit, if any, is left for disposal by the Post Office in such manner as seems best for the improvement of the system.

The Postmaster-General controls the British Broadcasting Corporation, in so far as such control is deemed desirable in the interest of the State. It operates in semi-independence under a charter and a licence. The Government may take control of all transmission in an emergency; any department may require transmission of matter which it considers necessary, and the Postmaster-General may forbid the transmission of any matter. Moreover, the Postmaster-General has brought pressure to bear on the Corporation, under which the relations of the governing body to its employees has been placed on a sound basis, partly as the result of an ill-advised attempt by the Corporation to prevent an action by an employee, which turned out to have been fully justified, as shown by a high award of damages (q). A wide discretion is given to the Corporation as regards the broadcasting of political matter, but it is understood that it must not show any partiality as between parties. On the whole its functions have been faithfully performed. In time of unrest, it is clear that control by the Government of broadcasting would be of paramount importance, and for that reason Broadcasting House has been constructed in a manner rendering seizure by a mob unlikely to succeed.

(q) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5091, 5207, 5329, 5337 (1936).

14. The Board of Trade.

The Board of Trade (r) is technically a Committee of the Privy Council, which was created by Order in Council, August 23rd, 1786, to replace an older body, which under the usual style of Board of Trade and Plantations was created by William III. in 1696, and abolished by Burke as needless and extravagant in 1782. The committee, which includes the Archbishop of Canterbury in its numbers, seldom met, and its work was done by a President and Vice-President, while individuals were added for special purposes on occasion, as in 1849, to advise on the Australian constitutions. In 1867 a Parliamentary Secretary replaced the Vice-President, and the title of Board of Trade dates from 1862. Originally advisory, its functions were gradually converted into executive and regulative, by the disappearance of the consultative branch in 1872, and the conferring of powers of control of railways by statute.

Its statistical work on matters of commerce and navigation, and its collection of information as to tariffs are reminders of its earlier history. Under the system of free trade its activities in advising the Foreign Office regarding the conclusion of Treaties were limited. The adoption of protection in 1931—32 has added considerably to its duties, as in the Ottawa Agreements with the Empire in 1932, and the discussions of the proposed Treaty with the United States in 1937—38. It is empowered by the Import Duties Act, 1932, to impose special duties on imports from countries which discriminate against British trade, and used successfully this power against France in 1934. One aspect of its eagerness to further overseas trade is seen in the Overseas Trade Department, whose Secretary is chosen in agreement with the Foreign Office, and which is subject to the two departments. It has an advisory committee for overseas trade credits.

(r) Sir H. L. Smith, The Board of Trade.

The Mines Department is under a Parliamentary Secretary, subordinate to the President, and has wide powers under the Mining Industry Act, 1920, and much later legislation. The Secretary appoints the members of the Coal Mines National Industrial Board and of the Coal Mines Re-organisation Commission. Its duties are substantially increased by legislation of 1938, providing for the acquisition by the State of all rights to royalties in respect of coal, and for the compulsory consolidation of the mining industry. Both production and export are drastically regulated. There is a Central Council of Coal Owners, an advisory committee on mines, and a committee on miners' welfare, which has effected important advantages for the miners.

The Marine Department of the Board deals extensively with merchant shipping and seamen. It controls registration and transfer of ships, the safety of ships and crews, life-saving regulations, manning and treatment of the crews, and allied subjects, and is concerned with the negotiation of international accords on these and cognate matters, such as collision regulations and regulations as to carriage of goods by sea, maritime liens, mortgages, &c. General and local lighthouse authorities fall under the Board.

The grant of letters patent and cognate matters are carried out by the Patent Office, and there are departments for bankruptcy and the winding-up of companies. It controls company registration and administers the Companies Acts. It is concerned with the standards of weights and measures, with trade marks and designs, and with the international conventions concerning these issues. On the other hand, its powers as to railways and harbours have gone to the Minister of Transport. But the Board retains power over gas undertakings, and shares with the Board of Education control over the Institute of Industrial Art.

The Board is advised by a Council, which represents commerce and industry, banking and finance, labour, the Dominions and India, and meets regularly under the President. There are also committees on such topics as cinematograph films, importation of plumage, dyestuffs, merchandise marks, and food. Until the discontinuation of the subsidy to tramp shipping it acted on the advice of a Tramp Shipping Committee.

15. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries.

The Board of Agriculture was created in 1889 to undertake powers vested in certain other authorities, the Privy Council as regards diseases of animals, and the Land Commissioners as regards tithes, enfranchisement of copyholds and powers of limited owners to deal with real property. In 1903 the Board of Trade surrendered control of fisheries. Originally, a Committee of Council with a President, it was transferred into a ministry in 1919 (s). A Parliamentary Secretary was allowed in 1909. It controls the Ordnance Survey and the Royal Botanical Gardens, Kew. Forestry is not under its control, having been assigned by the Forestry Act, 1919, to a body of eight Forestry Commissioners, incorporated by charter, and appointed by sign manual warrant. To them the care of Crown woods was handed over in 1933.

The introduction of the system of protection since 1931 for agriculture, no less than industry, has added largely to the functions of the ministry. It administers the subsidies provided for beet, sugar and cattle, and is partly responsible for setting up the Marketing Boards, which regulate agricultural marketing, in the case of hops, milk, potatoes, bacon and milk, and are elected by registered producers of these commodities under schemes promoted by producers, or by the Agricultural Marketing Re-organisation Commission. These bodies have very wide powers of regulating marketing, while provision is made for creating Development Boards for such secondary industries as may be promoted under the new scheme. The creation of Consumers' Committees to watch the interests of consumers, and of a Committee of Investigation to examine other forms of complaint, is authorised, while the ministry may make loans to Boards on the advice of the Agricultural Marketing Facilities Committee. The workers are catered for by the Agricultural Wages Board, which works through local committees. The Herring Industry Board is analogous to a Marketing Board, but remains the object of severe criticism by the fishing community. The subsidy to growers of wheat under the Wheat Act, 1932, is controlled by the Wheat Commission. In 1937 further subsidies were provided for farmers with a view to help those who could not profitably grow wheat, and to aid all in the improvement of their land, in view of the importance of not permitting further diminution of the areas under tillage (t).

(s) Sir F. L. C. Floud. The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries.

The ministry is assisted by a number of advisory bodies, the Agricultural Advisory Council, Councils of Agriculture for England and for Wales, a Committee on Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs, and a Committee on Grants to Unemployed Workers, while the Cattle Committee, the Market Supply Committee, and the Sea Fish Commission (u) are advisory to the authorities on agriculture in Scotland and Northern Ireland, as well as to the ministry.

16. The Ministry of Transport.

The Ministry of Transport was created in 1919. The minister is aided by a Parliamentary Secretary. Matters transferred to the ministry include railways, light railways, canals, waterways and inland navigation; tramways; roads, bridges and ferries; vehicles and traffic; and harbours, docks, and piers. With the concurrence of the Board of Trade the minister appoints the Electricity Commissioners, through whom he exercises the powers given to him by the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and the members of the Central Electricity Board, a chairman and seven members, who are appointed for from five to ten years, and may not sit in the (t) Agriculture Act, 1937.

(u) See Sea Fish Industry Act, 1938.

Commons. They are not, however, under his control, but have independent statutory authority and revenues, and supply electricity to railway companies, and electricity undertakers. The London Passenger Transport Board is still more independent, for the minister does not appoint, though he can remove members. It runs the whole London traffic system, excluding the main line railways, with which co-operation is arranged through the Standing Joint Committee on London Transport. The minister has important powers of making regulations under the Road Traffic Acts, 1930 and 1934, and under the London Passenger Transport Act, 1933. He appoints the members of the Appeal Tribunal, which hears appeals from the licensing authorities for vehicles appointed under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, and the traffic commissioners and authorities act under his general directions, though their functions are in considerable measure quasi-judicial, and therefore not controlled by him.

The minister controls Holyhead and Ramsgate Harbours, the Caledonian and Crinan Canals and Menai Bridge, and has limited authority over other harbours and dockyards, over railways, and over joint electricity authorities and electricity undertakers. He has the aid of a Roads Advisory Committee, a Tramways Advisory Committee, and a Transport Advisory Committee. The Rates Advisory Committee is concerned with railway rates, but the Railway Rates Tribunal has judicial functions, and is not under his control.

By a complete departure from precedent, the minister may be sued in contract or tort, and is liable in law for the acts and defaults of his officers, servants and agents, no doubt only in so far as their acts are done in their official capacity. The Board of Trade is similarly liable in respect of one class of act, detention of ships unfit to go to sea, a concession enforced by the strength at the time of shipping influence, and calculated to diminish seriously the protection for seamen.

17. The Ministry of Labour.

The New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916, opened the way to the establishment of a ministry, with a Parliamentary Secretary, devoted to the care of labour interests. It took over powers from the Board of Trade, and received fresh authority, since augmented. Its main functions are concerned with labour exchanges, trade boards, industrial conciliation and unemployment insurance and assistance to the able-bodied unemployed. The Unemployment Assistance Board under the Act of 1934, later amended, is not directly controlled by the Minister, and it has the primary duty of dealing with scales of relief, but he has important statutory authority in respect of it, and it has shown itself sensitive to requests of the minister, even when not legally obligatory upon it. He does not control the semi-judicial activities of the courts of referees, or the unemployment insurance umpire, nor the appeal tribunals under the Unemployment Assistance Act, though he is concerned with the appointment of these bodies. He appoints the members of the Industrial Court, which decides industrial disputes on a voluntary basis, and of special Courts of Inquiry into trade disputes, when these are set up to enlighten public opinion on serious cases of industrial unrest. For London there is a London Passenger Traffic Wages Board, though in 1937 the omnibus workers insisted on striking during the Coronation period in an unjustified attempt to blackmail the Board into submission to excessive demands, as was later shown by a court of enquiry.

There is an Unemployment Insurance Statutory Committee, as well as Cotton Industry Boards to guide the minister.

18. The Ministry of Health.

The Local Government Board was created in 1871 with a President and Parliamentary Secretary, who alone acted, to take over the powers of the Home Office, the Privy Council, and the Poor Law Board in respect of local government, public health and poor relief. It was transformed into a ministry in 1919 (x), when it took over the work as regards contributory pensions hitherto performed by the Insurance Commissioners, and some other departmental functions as to health. On the other hand, electoral matters were assigned to the Home Office. The new title, rather ad captandum, is plainly inadequate since local government concerns matters in addition to public health. Much additional work has been created by the system of rehousing the population with public aid, including the abolition of slums, and most recently the prevention of overcrowding by penalising such action as soon as housing is adequate to render it unnecessary. The minister is aided by a Central Housing Advisory Committee, as well as by a large staff. The National Health Insurance Joint Committee and the Therapeutic Substances Joint Committee advise him and the Department of Health for Scotland. The minister controls the General Register Office, which is concerned with the registration of births, deaths and marriages. The demand for power to require further particulars as to the marital conditions of the population, in order to aid in determining the possible means of combating the decline in population, which is about to be seen in the United Kingdom, led to strong protests in the Commons against illegitimate inquisitions, which had to be met by the elimination of any unregulated power to put questions. The Board of Control, which deals with persons who are insane or mentally deficient, is under the ministry, while the Government Lymph Establishment and the Pathological Laboratory are, though in practice independent, technically part of the ministry. The Central Midwives Board, formerly under the Privy Council Office, and the Nurses' Registration Council, which regulate practice by midwives and nurses under statute, are now in touch with the ministry.

The ministry has wide powers of control, mainly by inspection, grants, and sanctions or confirmations, but also by direct action in the event of other means failing, over local authorities, and over water undertakers and housing associations in the form of public utility companies, though not local authorities.

(x) Sir A. Newsholme, The Ministry of Health.

19. The Ministry of Pensions.

The Ministry of Pensions was the outcome of the Great War, being created in 1916 to deal with the new system of grants to ex-soldiers and dependants necessitated by national service. It is advised by a Central Advisory Committee and by local Pensions Committees, which make recommendations as to the treatment of individual cases. By Act of 1917 there is a Special Grants Committee under its control, while to deal with appeals there are Ministry Appeal Tribunals and the Pension Appeal Tribunals. The ministry is entitled to the aid of the Parliamentary Secretaries of the Admiralty and Ministry of Health and the Financial Secretary of the War Office. It has shown deep interest in the restoration, whenever possible, of the health of its beneficiaries and the welfare of dependants receiving pension, and has thus contributed towards public health. The total of its expenditure is now steadily decreasing.

20. The Board of Education.

The Board of Education (y) was created in 1899 with a President and a Parliamentary Secretary, and other members who have never met, thus continuing the form of the earlier control by the Privy Council over education. The creation seems to have rested at the time on personal, rather than public grounds of cogency, but the growth of the work of the ministry fully takes up the energies of a full time minister. The provision of school accommodation was made compulsory in 1870, that of instruction of children in 1876, and in 1902 a very important Act re-organised the local educational system, requiring all schools giving elementary education, whether voluntary, and so under the management of a majority of denominational managers, or rate-provided, to be supported by grants from the rates, supplemented by grants from central funds. The Board, by its grant regulations, has power to determine the whole course of educational development, so far as it receives public aid. It is advised by a Consultative Committee, whose labours extend over all aspects of education. The powers of the Charity Commissioners to remodel educational endowments under the Endowed Schools Acts have been transferred to the Board. It controls also the Victoria and Albert Museum, the Bethnal Green Museum, and the Royal College of Art, though not under express legislative authority. But it is statutorily connected with the Imperial War Museum.

(y) A. Selby-Bigge, Board of Education; B. M. Allen, Sir Robert Morant.

A Registration Council for teachers was established in 1907, and reconstituted in 1926. There is a statutory contributory pension scheme, and through the grant regulations the Board determines the training, qualifications and tenure of teachers. In like manner it regulates the construction of schools and their staffing, no less than the courses of instruction. To its grants are due the creation of special schools for blind, deaf, epileptic and retarded or defective children. The powers of local authorities and the Board were largely extended in 1918, and consolidated in 1921. Further changes to assist in the maintenance of voluntary schools by the grant of aid on proper conditions towards improvement of fabric are contemplated.

The Act of 1902 raised, in an acute form, the question of payment from rates for denominational education given by teachers of that denomination in schools provided voluntarily, and transferred to the general care of the local authorities, which in the schools provided by them can give only non-denominational education, though in all cases children may be withdrawn from religious education. The bitter controversy thence arising in Wales and other parts, where nonconformity is strong, helped the defeat of the Conservative party in 1906, but the efforts of the Liberal ministry to remedy the situation failed (z), and the passage of time has reduced, if it has not removed, the bitterness felt, due in part to the fact that the Act of 1902 was passed without any mandate, and was not desired by Lord Salisbury.

21. The Minor Ministries.

Other ministries are of less importance.

(1) The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is nominally in control of the King's lands in the Duchy, which extend beyond the limits of the county, and exercises what is left of the King's rights in respect of the County Palatine, which since the Judicature Act, 1873, are limited to the appointment and removal of County Court judges, and to patronage in respect of the Chancery Court. The office is conferred by letters patent, and is paid from Duchy funds, so that its holder cannot be criticised in the Commons on a vote for his salary. The post is regularly given to a lesser minister who can be employed in some way or another; thus Mr. Baldwin used the minister as an assistant (a), and Earl Winterton in 1938 was added to the Air Council (b) and given Cabinet rank, as was Mr. J. Davidson by Mr. Baldwin. The work of the office itself is done by subordinate officers with minimum supervision.

(2) The Office of Works may be traced back to Commissioners appointed in 1832 to manage the woods, forests and land revenues of the Crown, as a branch of the public revenue; they naturally, though without statutory sanction, applied the sums accruing to repair of buildings and maintenance of the public parks. In 1851 the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were separated from the Board of Works and Public (z) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 455—65, 658 f.; Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 65 ff.

(a) On retirement with his chief in 1937 he received a Viscountcy, the usual reward of a Secretary of State.

(b) On Sir K. Wood's appointment in lieu of Lord Swinton, Earl Winterton remained in the Cabinet, mainly for Home Office work. The Under-Secretary there was deputed for Air Raid Precautions.

Buildings, presided over by a First Commissioner, appointed by sign manual warrant, and regularly in Parliament. The Board never meets. He has charge of royal palaces and parks, and the fabric and furnishing of all public buildings, including the Palace of Westminister and oversea legations, on which, for the sake of magnifying the prestige of Britain, large sums have been recently expended with what wisdom and taste is disputed. Ancient monuments fall in his sphere, as well as the erection and maintenance of statues in the metropolitan district, Crown interests in Epping Forest, and the Acts regarding the geological survey.

(3) The Law Officers of the Crown date back to Edward I. and Edward IV. at least. They are both required in Parliament, but it is not usual that either should be in the Cabinet, though Sir R. Isaacs and Sir D. Hogg are instances to the contrary for the office of Attorney-General. No Solicitor-General has yet been thus treated, and in 1913 for the first time were both Privy Councillors. There are advantages, it is clear, in excluding from the Cabinet officers charged with the impartial and non-political administration of the law. The question how far instructions can properly be given to law officers regarding prosecutions in political issues has been discussed above (c).

Their function is to advise ministers on legal questions, and, while they do not draft Bills, it is normal that they should see Bills before Cabinet approval. They must defend in Parliament any attack on the legality of acts done by ministers, as in the case of the illegal deportation to the Irish Free State of Mr. Art O'Brien (d), which the Courts condemned, and for which reparation was duly made by the Restoration of Order in Ireland (Indemnity) Act, 1923. They intervene at the instance of private persons or corporations to vindicate public rights, since this cannot be done by ordinary members of the public, not specially affected by their violation. They conduct public prosecutions in those cases where it is not felt proper to leave the matter to prosecution in the ordinary manner at private instance. The Attorney-General may stop any criminal proceeding by entering a nolle prosequi, obviously a most important power, which might be misused, but for the force of public opinion in favour of the administration of the law without suspicion of favour.

(c) See p. 117, ante.

(d) Home Secretary v. O'Brien, [1923] A. C. 603.

In certain cases the fiat of the Attorney-General is requisite for legal proceedings, as under the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, the Incitement to Disaffection Act, 1934, and the Public Order Act, 1936. He can certify that a case is suitable for the bringing of an appeal from the Court of Criminal Appeal to the House of Lords: under this power very important issues regarding the character and nature of criminal liability have been disposed of (e). In certain cases, ill-defined in character, an action may be brought against him for a declaration of right, but this procedure is not permissible in substitution for a petition of right (f). The point is important, because for the latter the fiat of the Crown is necessary. He is consulted regularly as to the propriety of granting such a fiat.

The Solicitor-General acts in subordination to the Attorney-General, but has all the powers of the latter in the event of a vacancy in his office. Appointments are made by letters patent, and the remuneration is by a relatively small salary, plus large fees, but private business is forbidden. The offices lead normally, if desired, to a judgeship and to the Attorney-Generalship respectively, and are coveted by reason of the prestige and authority therewith connected, the Attorney-General ranking as head of the bar, and having the right to claim a trial at bar of any cause wherein the Crown has interest, and to reply in all criminal cases, whether evidence has been called for the defence or not. Both are formally (e) Woolmington v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1935] A. C. 462.

(f) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 351.

summoned to attend Parliament in the House of Lords with the judges at the commencement of each Parliament.

The Director of Public Prosecutions is subject to the control of the Attorney-General.

In Scotland the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General have analogous functions. One, at least, must be in Parliament, and except for special reason, as under the Labour ministry, it is better that both should be. The office of Procurator-Fiscal, which has control of all prosecutions, is under their control. There is an Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster, and a like officer and a Solicitor-General of the Palatine County of Durham, both of which have Chancery Courts.

22. The Parliamentary Under-Secretaries.

Reference has already been made to the regulation of the salaries, and ipso facto to some considerable extent of the status of these subordinate ministers, by the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937. Their functions vary with the department in which they serve, and with the question whether the chief of the department has a seat in the Commons or in the Lords. In the latter case it is obvious that the junior minister has an opportunity to win distinction and importance, denied to one who sits in the gilded chamber, and knows that his peers will regard with languid amusement or pained repugnance any emotion which tends to break the sacred calm of that chamber. Mr. Churchill, as Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1906—08 had opportunities of showing himself well suited to high office at the Board of Trade, while his chief was unceremoniously relegated to oblivion by Mr. Asquith. It is obvious also that fortune favours a junior member, like Mr. Butler, when his chief is in the Lords, and he shares with the Prime Minister the burden of dealing in the Commons with Foreign Affairs, after Mr. Eden and Lord Cranborne had refused to remain in the ministry after Signor Mussolini's ultimatum.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury has the important duties of chief whip; he advises the Prime Minister as to the best disposal of Parliamentary time in view of the programme of the ministry and the attitude of members; it is he who conveys to the Prime Minister the strength of feeling regarding the grant of governmental time to allow of the passing of such a measure as Mr. Herbert's Matrimonial Causes Bill, which had lost by an accident its normal chance of passing without special concession by the Government. It is he who explains whether it is wise to extend the duration of the session, or whether members are too tired to stay on. The Financial Secretary is, perhaps, even more important, though in a different sphere, for he relieves the Chancellor of the Exchequer of as much work as possible in connection with finance; he takes charge of the revenue departments and civil estimates, deals with Bills affecting the revenue, and defends the ministry on financial issues in the Commons. He becomes normally a financial expert, sure of promotion to a high ministry in due course (g).

The Under-Secretaries of State and the Secretaries to the Board of Trade, Board of Education, Health, Labour, Transport, Agriculture and Fisheries, and the Financial Secretaries to the War Office and Admiralty aid their ministers in various ways. It is easy to find a special rôle for the Financial Secretaries, for they can deal with large masses of dull business which the head of the department does not wish to see, unless some question of principle arises thereon. The other officers may be given definite spheres of work in which their rulings are normally final, unless they prefer to refer to the head of the department, either spontaneously, or at the request of the head of the permanent staff. The Under-Secretary of State for the Dominions sits as head of the Oversea Settlement Committee and other Secretaries can, by taking like official duties, smooth the path of their chiefs. Again, in many cases the work to be submitted to the chief passes in whole or part through the hands of the Under-Secretary, who should be kept informed of all important matters, even if he has not the time to deal with all of them preparatory to the action of his chief.

(g) Cf. Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 609, for his pleasure at Austen's obtaining this office. Mr. W. Graham won honourable distinction in it under Labour. Mr. Joynson-Hicks in 1923 held it as a Cabinet office, and was promoted to be Minister of Health; Taylor, pp. 167—69.

For all the work of the department the chief is, of course, responsible in the last resort, to the Cabinet on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other. But in practice he must leave his Parliamentary colleague authority to dispose of many issues, just as the permanent head has a delegation of authority in this way. Both must endeavour to secure that they do not fail to bring before their chief any matter which is of importance, either in itself, or as a possible subject of political interest. Where they have failed (h), their chief will usually endeavour to meet attack without disclosing that he has been badly served. But no head of a great department can succeed in discharging his duties unless he develops to a high degree the art of devolution.

The position of ministers or officers of the household, who answer questions in one House, when the head is in another, differs entirely. They merely act on the information supplied. Parliamentary private secretaries help to keep their chiefs in touch with the rank and file of the party, deputise for them in minor political engagements outside the Parliamentary sphere, and serve an apprenticeship in learning how a minister works. It is a useful introduction to ministerial life (i).

23. The Non-Political Departments.

Of the departments which are essentially non-political the most important, perhaps, is the Charity Commissioners, created by Act of 1853 for the purpose of protecting property held on charitable trust, for inquiry into the administration

(h) In respect of the Irish rebellion, both Mr. Birrell and Sir M. Nathan resigned; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 213 f. In the case of the police strike of 1918 Sir E. Henry resigned, but Sir G. Cave's offer was refused; Mallet, pp. 216, 217. In that of Mesopotamia Mr. Chamberlain resigned.

(i) Mr. Brett had this experience when in 1880 he entered Parliament under Lord Hartington; Journals, i. 63 ff.

of such trust, for facilitating the adaptation of charitable funds to new purposes, when requisite owing to change of circumstances, and for facilitating and cheapening dealings with the property of charities. Three of the Commissioners were to be salaried, but one was to be unpaid and eligible to sit in the Commons. This Commissioner, therefore, is usually available to answer questions which may be put to him, but he is not a minister. The Commissioners have powers to frame schemes for modification of charities, appeal lying to the Chancery Division; to sanction sales, leases and mortgages of property; to vest property in official trustees; to appoint new trustees, to advise them and give them an indemnity if they act as advised. Their powers, as to endowed schools, were transferred under the Act of 1899 to the Board of Education, and in that case appeal lies to the Privy Council from new schemes.

The Ecclesiastical and Church Estate Commissioners are a permanent body, consisting of the archbishops, bishops, three deans, certain ministers and judges, and nominated laymen. It has important functions in dealing with large amounts of ecclesiastical property, the revenues being employed to augment the endowments of benefices, or to endow new benefices. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners Measure, 1926, empowers the Commission to augment archdeaconries, to provide for new bishoprics, to defray legal expenses properly incurred by bishops in taking legal proceedings to vindicate the law of the Church, and to provide for the upkeep of Lambeth Palace and other buildings. The work as regards estates is done by Estate Commissioners, of whom the Government appoints two, one of whom may sit in the Commons, and is normally a supporter of the ministry. He can answer questions, but is not a minister.

The Forestry Commission has already been described; one Commissioner regularly answers questions in the Commons, but is not a minister.

Responsibility for the officers of the House of Lords and the House of Commons respectively rests with a Select Committee and a Statutory Committee, but the Treasury must in either case approve the salaries assigned.

Other departments are not possessed of ministers, nor of members, who may sit in the Commons to answer questions regarding them. They are in some cases controlled effectively by ministers, who therefore must defend their actions, as in the case of the departments controlled by the Treasury enumerated above (k). In other cases the degree of control varies very greatly; the Exchequer and Audit Department is independent, save as regards the salaries, &c., of the staff, other than the Comptroller and Auditor-General, whose salary, like those of the judges and of the Unemployment Assistance Board, is charged on the Consolidated Fund. The Treasury has control whenever funds must be voted, but even then it may be comparatively slight, as in the case of the expenses of the Royal Courts of Justice. The Minister of Transport controls the Electricity Commissioners, but not the Central Electricity Board, or the London Passenger Transport Board, even when it refuses to encourage its servants joining the Territorial Army in a time of national danger. The Postmaster-General adopts the policy, approved by Parliament, of reducing to a minimum his interference with the action of the British Broadcasting Corporation, as regards the material broadcasted or the cancellation of broadcasts, because of political conditions, e.g., in March, 1938, talks on the issue of the German claim for restitution of her colonies. The multiplication of semi-independent authorities is a feature of recent developments, including the handing over to executive authorities of many quasi-judicial functions, which can best be administered by bodies not under continuous control by ministers. Such are the tribunals and other authorities under the Acts dealing with road and rail traffic, unemployment insurance, unemployment assistance, the Income Tax Acts, and so forth. Of the more important of these, note has been taken in their appropriate place above.

(k) See p. 171, ante.

CHAPTER VII.

CABINET AND PARLIAMENT.

1. Cabinet Control and the House of Commons.

THERE was, no doubt, a time when the House of Commons had definitely a position of strength as opposed to the ministry of the day. Mr. Bagehot's classical treatise, representing the view of an acute observer in 1867, treats the Commons as the centre of political power, and of political influence, as forming political opinion (a). Moreover, it is only if we understand the constitution in the light of this point of view, that the history of Lord Palmerston becomes really intelligible. The electorate was deferential; the ten-pound householder held that his representative, from superior education and experience of affairs, was better able to devise policy than he, and so was content to follow in his lead. The Commons, thus composed of men who were not subject to any excessive need for placating electors, was independent; it was not sent from the country to choose a Prime Minister at its bidding, but given a freedom of choice. It could dismiss Lord Aberdeen in 1855, but equally Lord Palmerston in 1858. Moreover, government was based on full discussion by serious men, discussion in which the results were not determined beforehand, but which might lead to changes in the feelings of members and of the public, which looked up to Parliament for reasoned guidance, not for enactment of measures determined upon ab extra.

The passage of time has seen vital changes in this attitude, and has completely altered the position of the Commons, changing incidentally the attraction once possessed by mere membership, so that an ex-Cabinet minister (b) can say, with complete sincerity, that he would much rather be a member of the London County Council than a private member of Parliament, and one of the leading lights of the Labour ministry (c) has devoted, since leaving office, far more attention to his work on that body than to the attractions of criticism of the ministry in the Commons, despite his high qualifications for that purpose, and the obvious weaknesses of his party in debate. The same cause helps to explain how few young men of promise now, as compared with earlier times, devote their talents to a political career, taking their talents instead to finance or commerce. That the House still has attractions is due in part to the fact that ministerial office has high advantages, and that ministerial posts, great and small, are remarkably numerous, offering possibilities to any young men of ability, in part to the fact that barristers in practice find it possible to combine that work with membership of the Commons.

(a) English Constitution (1st ed., 1867; 2nd ed., 1872).

A further sign of the diminished respect in which the House is held, is seen in the tendency to favour extra-Parliamentary action for the attainment of ends which should manifestly be sought by Parliamentary means. The tendency was seen in the war, when Mr. R. MacDonald lent some measure of support to the plan of setting up workers' and soldiers' councils to secure, in the Russian manner, an end of the war; in 1920 (d), when it was proposed by a Council of Action to promote a general strike in order to thwart the Governmental policy of sending munitions and other aid to the Polish Government, which was striving against the Bolsheviks; in 1921, when it was endeavoured to organise miners, railwaymen and transport workers, so as to force the Government to accept the demands of the miners (e); in 1926, when long smouldering hostility to (b) Mr. McKinnon Wood.

(c) Mr. Herbert Morrison.

(d) D. C. Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 213 ff.

(e) April 15th was "Black Friday," when the railwaymen and transport workers held back.

Parliament manifested itself in the grave crime against society of the general strike, which happily was defeated by the solid disapproval of vast masses of the people, and the grave doubts of many of the workers, who were precipitated into action menacing to the common welfare, and inspired by hostility to orderly progress (f). A grave ebullition of the same temper, this time in the navy, manifested itself in 1931, when Britain was forced off the gold standard as a result of the mutiny at Invergordon (g), which recalled the deplorable events of 1914, when officers at the Curragh manifested their disloyalty to the State. There is little left of the deference of the electorate. A member finds it exacting and pertinacious in its demands on his time and services, and singularly ungrateful.

It follows, therefore, that the constituencies have changed their attitude. The electorate has suffered enormous additions in 1884, in 1918, and in 1928, and with the growth of the electorate it has developed a growing readiness to vote not for principles of any definite sort, but for personalities. It is, of course, true that the circumstances of the day, in a measure, render it easier for the electorate to form definite opinions on public issues, for literature of all sorts is more easily available, and political propaganda of an educational character is steadily carried on throughout the year, especially on the part of Labour. But against this must be set the fact that a very large number of electors are young, and, especially if women, very indifferent to the issues raised. They tend, therefore, to vote for personalities, and to trust leaders rather than programmes. This tendency was early in development. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli aroused strong loyalty and repulsion, and the victory of 1892 (h), imperfect as it was, was won on personal grounds alone. On the fall of Lord

(f) See Somervell, op. cit., pp. 351—68, 380 f.; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 261 ff.

(g) Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. 344 f.

(h) Morley, iii. 490 ff. The dissensions among the Irish owing to the split over Mr. Parnell (d. 1891), helped to render British voters reluctant.

Rosebery's ministry, it clearly lacked any leader with an appeal equal to that of Lord Salisbury, who had carried on the government from 1886 to 1892, and had definitely established himself in the public eye as a solid statesman. But the victory in the "khaki" election of 1900 was largely due to Mr. Chamberlain's personality (i). Mr. Balfour in 1905, in resigning office, effectively doomed his party to extinction for the time being. Palpably a minister, who dare not go to the country, proclaims his lack of personal magnetism. Neither victory in 1910 would have been possible if Mr. Asquith had not established himself in the public mind as trustworthy, and not likely to abuse a fresh term of office. The election of 1918 (k) was won on the personal appeal of the statesman, who was believed, on his own valuation, to have won the war, and it was the unpopularity of that statesman, through his seeming recklessness of facing the possibility of a renewal of the war with Turkey in 1922, which proved his undoing in the election of 1922; Mr. Bonar Law's appeal was put clearly as that of a solid statesman, who had provided the guiding spirit in the coalition ministry prior to his retirement, and who could be counted upon to bring things back to normal after the conclusion of Mr. Lloyd George's regime. Mr. Baldwin's appeal in 1923, on the other hand, was definitely one of principle, for the electorate had little knowledge of the young leader, whose chief feat, that of securing a settlement of the debt to the United States (l), had not aroused great enthusiasm outside the City, which fully appreciated the advantages to financial interests of the work involved in arranging matters consequent on the annual payment to the United States of the war debt interest, and sinking fund. Hence his failure to carry a policy of protection, which ran counter to the convictions of many Conservatives. On the other hand, the Labour débâcle of 1924 was deeply influenced by Mr. MacDonald's apparent interference with the course of justice in the Campbell case, and probably even more so by the Zinovieff letter (m), whose authenticity, much disputed, none the less may probably be accepted. Mr. Baldwin, in contrast, stood out as the moderate and sound man. But his ministry proved uninspiring, its interference with the system of local government, towards its close, evoked resentment, as did its insistence on equalising the franchise in 1928, and the error was made of appealing to the electorate in the pictorial form of a rather unflattering likeness of the Premier with a caption "Safety first" (n). It is not surprising that Mr. MacDonald proved to have a stronger appeal to the younger voters. The election of 1931 saw both leaders united, with the Liberal chief, in a joint appeal for the restoration of financial equilibrium, which was irresistible in its effect. On the other hand Mr. MacDonald's popularity was so manifestly on the wane by 1935 that his retirement in June was no doubt timely in permitting the appeal to the electorate taking place under Mr. Baldwin's auspices (o).

(i) Garvin, iii. 571 f., 582 ff. (k) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 311 ff.

(l) Against Mr. Bonar Law's advice; Taylor, pp. 272—74.

Programmes therefore are inseparably bound up with personalities, and members of Parliament find themselves returned as followers, not so much of a party, as of the party leader. Nothing can be more significant than the attitude adopted in February and March, 1938, over the foreign policy of Mr. Chamberlain. The appeal made was very largely not to reasoned defence; no doubt that was present, but the average elector was asked simply to put trust in the leader, and to sympathise with him in his heavy burden of responsibility, and in the main the support then accorded by public feeling was expressive of this point of view. It is essentially bound up with the fact that the public, as represented by the average elector, does not feel well equipped to decide on policy, but does believe itself a good judge of a man to trust and follow. It would be vain to believe that the people are excellent judges of policy, as Mr. Gladstone once recklessly claimed (p), and it would be premature to believe that they have yet attained the ideal envisaged by Lord Bryce (q), of “a sound perception of the main and broad issues of national and international policy, especially in their moral aspect—a perception sufficient to enable them to keep the nation’s action upon right lines.”

(m) Keith, Int. Affairs, 1919—37, i. 106 ff.

(n) Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 396—402.

(o) Somervell, op. cit., p. 506.

In these circumstances it would be idle to expect that the members of the Commons should feel free to make or break ministries, or even to deal, with independent judgment, with the policies submitted by ministers. It remains to consider the mechanism by which the new order of things, since Mr. Bagehot’s day, is made operative.

2. The Mechanism of Control: the Party System and the Whips.

The organisation of parties existed in Mr. Bagehot’s day, but it had not assumed anything like its modern strength or effectiveness. Parties, themselves divided on real issues, in a sense became real only over reform in 1831 (r). In the pre-reform era voters were too few in most boroughs, and too few and too scattered in the counties, for organisation to seem requisite. But the Act of 1832, not merely created a relatively numerous electorate, adding 217,000 voters, but prescribed registration as a condition of voting. It had already been found necessary by the Whigs to raise funds to finance candidates who advocated reform, and for a short time the Parliamentary Candidate Society had existed to co-ordinate action and to recommend suitable candidates to constituencies. The Conservatives naturally rallied from the effects of the Act of 1832, and set about seeking to regain power; hence for the election of 1834—35 a central fund was raised, and a party organiser appeared for Sir R. Peel, in the person of Lord Granville Somerset, who adapted to modern conditions the activities of Burke on behalf of Lord Rockingham. Local registration societies (s) sprang up among Whigs and Conservatives alike to bring on to the register those likely to support their views; gradually canvassing voters was added to their activities, and persuasion to poll followed, but nomination of candidates was slow to develop; would-be members were left to submit themselves, or were put forward by influential leaders, acting individually or in concert.

(p) Speeches ix. (1886—88), 133 f.; Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 292, 310.

(q) Studies in History and Jurisprudence, ii. 31.

(r) Emden, op. cit., pp. 98—108. After 1846 there was confusion to 1868; Greville, Journal, 1852—60, i. 180 f.; Morley, Gladstone, i. 621.

A fundamental development was seen in the introduction under Mr. J. Chamberlain of the caucus system, which he had seen working in America.

Under it (t) the supporters of the Liberal party in each ward of the city of Birmingham were brought to co-operate in choosing a ward committee, and a central convention was added, to which representatives were sent from the ward committees. This proved of conspicuous value in the general election of 1868, for the reforms of 1867 had devised the plan, in the interests of minority representation, of creating multi-member constituencies in which the voters were authorised to vote for one less than the number of seats. The general committee of the central association undertook the work of nominating the candidates and advising the electors how to vote, so that the party captured the three seats vacant, and in like manner it secured control of the city council and the school board. The new principles of general associations, as opposed to small registration societies, and of their selection of candidates, were thus finally asserted. In 1877 Mr. Chamberlain secured the establishment of the National Liberal Federation, based on agreement of representatives of local associations to co-operate, and he impressed upon the movement the right to select candidates, and to enunciate programmes which their leaders would be induced to homologate. In this way in 1883 the federation meeting adopted resolutions in favour of female suffrage and the extension of household suffrage to the counties. There were clearly difficulties in this procedure, which it was sought to check by the appointment in 1887 of Mr. F. Schnadhorst, the first secretary of the federation, to be honorary secretary of the Central Liberal Association, thus giving the leaders of the party the opportunity of exercising through him a moderating influence on the exuberance of the federation (u), whose members naturally were without any of the responsibilities of carrying through Parliament the wide schemes of reforms for which they joyfully voted at the annual conference. Mr. Schnadhorst, however, was quite unable to prevent the adoption, with the reluctant acquiescence of the party leaders, of the grandiose Newcastle programme of 1891, with its declaration in favour of Irish Home Rule, the rule of manhood suffrage, the disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales and the Church of Scotland, local veto, the creation of parish councils, and compensation to workers for injury. Unquestionably so elaborate a programme was certain to prove most embarrassing to the ministry of 1892, with its majority of forty but barely sufficient for moderate legislation, and with the solid opposition of the House of Lords to reform. The lesson was not wholly wasted. The business for the annual meeting of the Council, which Mr. Chamberlain had planned to be the informal Parliament of Liberalism, was given in 1896 to an Executive Committee to frame, and the Council thus came to perform the part desired by Mr. Schnadhorst of homologating great policies which the leader had determined to be suitable for party support, with a reasonable prospect of being able to carry them into effect if and when the electorate gave power.

(s) Lord Leveson ascribed failure in 1841 to want of Liberal registration, Fitzmaurice, i. 36; Emden, op. cit., pp. 133 ff.

(t) See Garvin, Chamberlain, i., for his hero's contribution.

(u) For criticisms, see Gardiner, Harcourt, ii. 407; Crewe, Rosebery, ii. 595. For the curious episode of Mr. Rhodes' donation of £5,000 in 1891, see Spender, Campbell-Bannerman, i. 204.

The comparatively restricted sphere of the federation side by side with the Central Office has remained unaltered in essentials through the many vicissitudes of the party since the war, which have resulted in changes in detail in organisation, partly due to the necessity of co-operation with Mr. Lloyd George, whose political fund, collected during the period before the breaking up of the coalition Government (x), was only put in part at the disposal of the party for electoral purposes under conditions securing a measure of control by its holder. In 1936, however, the federation was re-constituted by the Liberal Party Convention as the Liberal Party. The system is of the form suggested in 1877; local constituency associations (y), in substantial measure autonomous, districts with area federations to foster joint action, and the federation, renamed the Liberal party, with its Council and Assembly. The control of the selection of candidates is vital, it rests in part with the constituency, in part with the central or whip's office, whose approval is essential if the candidate is to be aided wholly or in part towards the payment of his election expenses. The party funds were in the period of free trade supplied in some measure (z) by firms and others interested in the maintenance of that system. Since the decline of free trade, and since the fortunes of the party have fallen on evil days, this source of supply has been mainly cut off, and an effort has been made with some success to induce local associations to finance their own expenses, and to build up a fighting fund for elections. Few candidates are now forthcoming fortunate enough to be able and willing to meet their own expenditure, a fact which explains the dependence at the election of 1929 of the party on Mr. Lloyd George's support for the funds necessary to permit of putting enough candidates in the field to render an effective contest practicable. With the growing decline in the fortunes of the party and the separation from it of the Liberal Nationals, who have created an organisation of their own on parallel lines, but with slight support of the rank and file, the prospect for the party fortunes reviving steadily diminishes. The federation has a counterpart in Scotland, which is in close association though not dependent upon it, in the Scottish Liberal Federation, and the special aspects of Liberalism, which appeal to women, are catered for in the Women's Liberal Federation. The League of Young Liberals provides an organisation for youth.

(x) Mallet, Lloyd George, pp. 246 ff.

(y) Other bodies may be affiliated and allowed representation on Council and Assembly.

(z) Peers and M.P.'s to the number of 114 were expected in December, 1879, to pay up an average of £500; Esher, Journals, i. 65. Cf. the attempt in 1925 to raise a million fund; Sir Robert Hudson: a Memoir, pp. 172 f. Each constituency is now expected to raise funds for its own expenses and for the general election; the Council also raises funds, and is in touch with the whip's office, and encourages constituents to find candidates. It works through four Standing Committees. The Executives of the League of Young Liberals and the Women's Liberal Federation rank as Committees.

The National Union of Conservative and Constitutional Societies was the outcome of the addition of a million new voters by the Reform Scheme of 1867, and its progress was stimulated by the contemporary success of the caucus scheme in Birmingham. But its expansion in authority was delayed until a re-organisation in 1885—86, which created a regional organisation intermediate between the Union and the local associations. The plan of passing resolutions on policy dates thence, but at no time, down to the present, has the annual Conference of the Union possessed much importance as an exponent of independent views (a). Its support of preferential trade was ignored prior to Mr. Chamberlain's conversion, its advocacy of female suffrage went unheeded, its more recent pleading for the reform of the House of Lords has received no homologation from Mr. Baldwin's or Mr. Chamberlain's régimes, and only on India was the division of opinion regarded as sufficiently strong to induce the Prime Minister to lend his weight to efforts to secure that the Union should not, either at a Council meeting or at the annual Conference, definitely reject the scheme. It is rare for the Conference to carry any resolution against the views of the ministers who attend to encourage it to walk in safe paths; surprise was widely felt when in 1937 a grievance of ex-servicemen elicited a demand for an enquiry protested against by the minister responsible (b). It does not seem that the protest has availed.

(a) It was, however, the fear of hostility at the National Union meeting of November 13th, 1922, that decided the loyal coalition ministers to dissolve before them and appeal to the electorate as a coalition; this led to the secession of Lord Curzon and the break up of the ministry; Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 276 ff.

Funds are readily available for Conservative purposes: from landowners, financiers, industrialists, bankers, those engaged in the manufacture and distribution of intoxicants and others, for the party is naturally regarded as still the stronghold of property, and as essential to defend those who enjoy it from the assault of communism or socialism. Even so, there has been a movement to seek to secure that local associations shall adopt the plan of raising funds for their own expenses, and to aid in the payments of expenses of candidates who otherwise could not stand. One difficulty of the party has long been the fact that constituencies are eager to select candidates who can normally be trusted to defray all the expenses of their election and the maintenance of the local party agent, to the exclusion of young men of promise but without resources. This fact hampers the effectiveness of the party, and produces, what is at times, but not often, embarrassing, a number of members who may not be wholly amenable to the party whips. It has therefore been decided that candidates, while chosen primarily by the chief constituency associations, shall also be approved by a Standing Advisory Committee. The proposal was criticised on March 24th, 1938, on the score that it might give too much power to the central office, but it was defended on the ground that the Committee commanded general confidence, and understood its function to be to aid associations in finding suitable candidates, not to impose candidates upon them. The alternative would no doubt be to leave the decision in effect to the Chairman of the Central

(b) Effect to it was definitely refused by the Premier in April, 1938.

Office (c), who is the nominee of the Prime Minister as head of the party and in immediate control of the party funds, whose wise employment for propaganda is an essential factor in organising victory.

The Labour party presents a different aspect to the older parties, and one undoubtedly more democratic. In its inception, indeed, it was essentially a class body; the organisers of the Labour Representation Committee of 1900, and the controllers of the early form of the party, were imbued with the idea that the workers were manual workers par excellence, and the party constitution was based on a federation of trade unions, trades councils, socialist societies, and some local Labour parties. In 1918, with the passing of the Representation of the People Act, giving manhood suffrage, a wider policy prevailed, and the Nottingham Conference opened the way to membership of the party, not merely by affiliated organisations, but also by individual men or women who were members of local Labour parties and accepted its constitution and programme (d), it being made clear that work included brain work as fully as manual labour. This was followed by the constitution of many local parties, together with the reconstruction of those already existing, to allow of effect being given to the new views. In 1927 an important accession of strength was secured through the acceptance of a formal alliance by the Congress of the Co-operative Union. In October, at the Blackpool Conference, the Executive Committee was authorised to prepare a statement of Labour objectives, and its elaborate pronouncement, Labour and the Nation, was accepted by the Birmingham Conference in 1928. The failure of the Labour Prime Minister in 1931 to hold fast to the doctrines thus promulgated at his own original suggestion and with his consent has strengthened,

(c) The great importance of this office in the hands of Sir G. Younger was seen in his influence on the "coupon" election of 1918 (Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 314 ff.), and on the Unionist desertion of Mr. Lloyd George in 1922.

(d) Labour and the New Social Order (prepared in 1917). The party now became definitely socialist in creed.

not weakened, the determination of the party to secure that its policy shall be carried out. Since 1929 affiliated associations have been required to accept the principles and policy of the party, to conform to its constitution and standing orders, and to submit their rules to the executive of the party. This principle has caused serious dissension, because a section of the Labour party, while not desiring to incur the unpopularity of adopting Communism, with its denial of democratic government and its enthusiasm for a dictatorship of the proletariat, is anxious to co-operate, as far as possible, with Communists. This led to the disaffiliation of the Independent Labour Party in 1931 (e), but the contest was renewed in 1936—37, because of the activities since 1934 of the Socialist League, whose leading spirit was Sir S. Cripps, and which on the analogy of the Popular Front in France, formed by Radicals, Socialists, and Communists after the election of 1936, desired to secure a common front against capitalism of the Labour party and Communists. In 1937, however, this effort was defeated by a very decisive vote of the Conference, though the vote was softened by the contemporaneous adoption of an important reform in the manner of constituting the executive committee.

That body was under the early constitution, composed of sixteen members elected by the annual Conference, eleven representing the trade union movement. In 1918 the number was increased to twenty-three, of whom thirteen were assigned to the national affiliated societies, five to local parties, four to represent women, and the Treasurer ex officio, nominations being made by societies and constituency organisations respectively, and election being determined by the full Conference. This arrangement was naturally attacked by the intelligentsia, as restricting unduly their influence on the executive, and the number of members open to election to represent the local parties was increased, after a somewhat close vote, to seven, Sir S. Cripps becoming at once a chosen member. In that capacity, however, he had to cease co-operation on platforms with Communists, while the Socialist League came to an end. The pro-Communist elements of the party have thus obtained a wider sphere of operation from within the party itself, which accords with the tactics enjoined by the Third International (f).

(e) Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Snowden had resigned in 1930.

The Executive Committee performs like functions to those carried out by the Conservative and Unionist Central Office. It controls the Central Office of the party, and it takes care to secure that the party is represented in each constituency by an organisation, if at all possible; it gives effect to the decisions of the Conference, interprets both constitution and standing orders in case of dispute, subject to appeal to the Conference, and expels individuals and disaffiliates organisations if they offend against the constitution. It promotes the activity of a large number of organisers of men and women alike, and supervises research in the fields of information on labour topics, in international relations, promotes publicity in various forms, and shares with the Trades Union Congress a department for legal advice. The research department is prolific of information on public finance, health, education, justice, local government, land and agriculture, and propaganda is largely provided in the form of pamphlets. The former policy of seeking to run a party newspaper, the Daily Herald, has been departed from in favour of entrusting the control to a skilled newspaper organiser, with excellent results. The central organisation exercises a definite influence on the selection of candidates. The initiative of the local constituency is essential, but the final approval of the executive is necessary. It is requisite that a would-be candidate should stand simply and solely as a Labour candidate, and that in his election address he should include the issues which have been approved by the executive as proper to be stressed at the moment, while, if elected, he must agree to act in accordance with the constitution and standing orders. A problem of special difficulty presents itself with regard to the selection of candidates in areas where a certain trade union is strongly represented, for the union is apt to claim that its favourite should be chosen, especially as the unions are the source whence most of the funds of the party are derived. The system secures a revenue from contributions of unions, socialist and co-operative societies, Labour parties, and trades councils, but the only large returns are from the unions, which were permitted by the Trade Union Act, 1913, as modified by the Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act, 1927, to collect a political levy from all members stating their willingness to contribute. But, though the unions frequently secure the choice of their protégés, this is by no means always the case. As in the case of the other parties, it is customary to raise by special appeals a fighting fund for a general election, a consideration which gives special weight to the views of the unions.

(f) In 1938 the executive denounced any idea of forming a Popular Front with Liberals or any others.

The control of the executive over a candidate once elected is indirect. But the desire of the party to maintain solidarity is seen in the system under which the executive co-operates with the executive chosen by the Parliamentary party and the General Council of the Trades Union Congress in the National Council of Labour. Thus, on March 25th, 1938, after a conference in London of these bodies, a manifesto was issued condemning the attitude of Mr. Chamberlain in the matter of Czechoslovakia and the League of Nations, and demanding an immediate meeting of the League Assembly. In the same spirit of democracy, when Labour is in office, a consultative committee is appointed to keep the rank and file in touch with the ministry, and, when not in office, an executive committee determines the party policy in those minor issues which do not fall under the general principles of the party (g). In the case of the Conservative and Liberals, on the other hand, the control remains with the ex-Prime Minister, who normally consults with the members of his last Cabinet, to whom on occasion other men of promise may be added.

(g) Any accord in regard to bargaining in constituencies for electoral purposes would need the assent of the National Executive.

Thus, a summary sketch of the organisations indicates clearly how little independence is left to the average candidate for Parliament. In almost every case to seek a seat without party backing is mere waste of time and money. A candidate therefore has to pledge his support to the party, or more specifically to the Prime Minister or leader of the opposition, as the case may be. Moreover, his chance of success will largely depend on the strength with which he is believed to hold the faith. The average member elected thus is, normally by habit of mind and profession, a strict party man. Once elected, he falls under the control of the party whips, governmental or opposition, whose business it is to see that the members do not stray from the party fold, and that they vote regularly, except when with due permission they are paired. No doubt the extent of the discipline exercised varies from time to time. If the majority is large, it is impossible to avoid slackness in attendance, and members will absent themselves unpaired. But they must rally if the summons is specially urgent, and failure to obey an urgent summons is strictly looked into. The whips, of course, are aided in their task by many considerations, in addition to the personal appeal which men like Mr. Akers-Douglas, Mr. Marjoribanks, or the Master of Elibank could exercise by dint of character and psychological insight. Men have many motives to be loyal. They feel a definite obligation to their constituents; Mr. Mason in 1932 did not deny the right of his constituents in East Edinburgh to criticise his opposition to Protection, but insisted that he had made his retention of the right to oppose clear during the electoral contest when Conservatives had voted for him; in 1935, however, he was relegated to the bottom of the poll. In March, 1938, a hot controversy was carried on between Mr. Charles Emmott and the executive committee of the East Surrey Unionist Association, which demanded his resignation apparently, because, while he proved a loyal supporter of the ministry, he was not afraid to express his own sentiments. It is interesting to note that the committee (h) was not willing, in his opinion, to give him adequate facilities for his defence.

A further consideration of weight is the interest a member naturally feels in either public or private legislative proposals, which may suffer if he proves recalcitrant to the orders of the whips. A private member has indeed a chance by the luck of the ballot to secure a second reading for a Bill, but, when it passes committee, it often has no chance of passing a third reading unless the Government will prove helpful. Thus the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, promoted by Mr. A. P. Herbert, received its chance only through governmental favour, which would not have been accorded to a persona ingrata. Members again may be interested in procuring for themselves, or others, honorary distinctions, or office, ministerial or other, or be anxious to serve on royal committees, and such favours are not for recalcitrant members, who cannot look to enthusiasm if they seek to promote the interests of their constituency or individuals therein with any government department, whereas a minister will accord unusual complaisance to the member who comes to him with a suggestion from the chief whip, that he would be glad if anything can be done for so and so, who is such a loyal supporter.

Yet another consideration weighs heavily with the recalcitrant member. If he falls from grace the whips will report his activities to his constituency association, and he will be refused their imprimatur if he seeks re-election. Without it very few members can hope for a new term of membership, and few men are eager to fight an election at their own cost and with scant prospect of success. To those who depend in any measure on their salaries (i) for their living the issue is one of grave importance, and loyalty becomes almost automatic. It is this consideration which renders so effective a hint that, if the Government is not supported on some issue, it will dissolve Parliament. The member who hears this threat is conscious that he may very well be a sufferer from hastily induced action, and may speedily find it possible to reconsider his views. The day is certainly gone when members could face a threat of this sort with equanimity, and the hold of the ministry is thus greatly increased. It may be that Labour members are specially tied to obedience, but it is not clear that, in fact, either Conservative or Liberal members are in a much better case. In opposition, of course, there is less severity of pressure (k), but here also it is very far from being the case that freedom is widely granted. Where the party seeks, for instance, to secure a snap vote against the ministry, punctual obedience is demanded.

(h) These bodies are nearly always composed of a small body of stalwarts who hold together and secure re-election at meetings of the Constituency Associations, which normally are poorly attended, by mutual support. Hence the frequent choice of unsatisfactory candidates, especially those commended by the Central Office; e.g., Mr. MacDonald's selection for the Scottish Universities in 1936.

The force of these considerations appears fully in the fact that so few members dissociate themselves from their party on vital issues. The abandonment of sanctions in June, 1936, was plainly an action incompatible with the obligations of the Crown deliberately undertaken in the Covenant of the League of Nations, and many Conservatives were certainly resentful that the policy on which the election of 1935 had in part been won should thus be reversed. But Mr. H. Macmillan alone resented the volte face sufficiently to cease to desire the party whip, and even so favourably situated a member felt it necessary, in order to participate in useful activities in Parliament, to apply, when Mr. Chamberlain took office, for its resumption. Not less striking was the fact that Mr. Eden's enforced resignation, rather than treat with Italy under an ultimatum, did not produce any serious defection from the party loyalty, when on February 2nd the Prime Minister defended his attitude. Moreover, Mr. Eden himself declined in any way to embarrass his party or to encourage a schism, a most significant proof of the bonds of party loyalty, even when it was felt that the Prime Minister was endangering national interests by an excursion into the field of foreign politics, with scant capacity to confront the Duce (l) or the Fuehrer. His reward is clearly presaged in the insistence of ministers, such as Mr. Elliot, on the probability of an earlier return to office.

(i) The increase of Parliamentary salaries to £600, and all Cabinet salaries to £5,000 in 1937, accentuated the position.

(k) Cf. Sir E. Grey's detachment (1895—1905); Twenty-five Years, i. 57 f. But such cases grow rarer.

Devotion to party, it must be remembered, is not irrational. Party is, as matters stand, the essential mode of working the British constitution. It is, in fact, merely an application in the political sphere of the essential characteristic of human co-operation for common ends. In this way only can there be effective propaganda and dissemination of views, only thus can public opinion be organised and educated along definite lines. The selection of suitable candidates for Parliament can best be secured on the basis of co-operation between a local and a central body, and it is party organisation which provides ministers and leaders of the opposition, which are the necessary condition of the successful working of British democracy. No doubt the party organisation does not operate so as to provide guidance for the formation of policy, which must largely be left to other agencies, but it does keep the ministers in useful touch with the feeling of the party, as well as the party with ministerial projects, and thus secures solidarity of feeling and action.

It is easy to understand the working of the party system where two parties alone exist or where, if parties are in form distinct, there are causes resulting in their functioning as one.

(l) For a criticism of the Treaty of April 16th, 1938, see Keith, The Scotsman, April 19th, 1938. The Duchess of Atholl alone in April, 1938, renounced the party whip, because of the Government's failure in duty towards Spain. Cf. Commons Debate, May 2nd.

Thus the Liberal Unionists, from the nature of things, were soon compelled so wholly to function with the Conservatives that there could be no doubt of the support of Conservative doctrines by Unionists. The way, therefore, lay open for the composite ministry of 1895, and ultimately for the merger of the Unionist organisation with that of the Conservatives. It was only in 1912 that union was consummated, giving the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations: it worked smoothly from the first. “The astonishing thing is that it should have been necessary to maintain the distinction so long after a united Government had been formed, in view of the strength of the prejudice for and against the old party names” (m).

In the case of the Irish Nationalist party, which afforded for so long support to the Liberals, it was dominated by the aim of achieving Home Rule by this alliance, and, despite the fact that its members were hardly at all of orthodox Liberal views, the party’s loyalty was amazingly maintained in the period 1906–14. In 1910, indeed, when the general election had made the Liberals dependent on Irish support, the objections of the Nationalists to the raising of the spirit duties nearly led to a clash fatal to the ministry, especially as the Nationalists were anxious to delay the budget until the proposals of the Government for dealing with the obstruction offered by the Lords to the passage of Home Rule had been passed. Only with much difficulty was the issue accommodated (n).

Neither of these parties thus affected the general working of the party system in any substantial measure. The advent, however, of the Labour party, and its rapid rise to the position of the second party in the State, as shown by the elections of 1922 and 1923, have considerably affected the position by creating the possibility of the emergence of a three-party system. Very important effects might thus be produced on the operation of Cabinet Government. The dictatorial power of the Prime Minister would obviously be undermined if he did not command a majority in the Commons. It would become necessary for him to seek collaboration with the other parties to endeavour to pass such measures as commanded general support, or, at least, the support of another party, and he could no longer expect to be able to hold over his supporters the threat of a dissolution, for under this state of things he could not claim the right authoritatively to advise the Crown to dissolve. In the same way it would be necessary for the Government of the day to leave issues so far as possible open. The Government whips could not be put on unless the matter were clearly vital. The Commons would thus resume the power it enjoyed in Mr. Bagehot's time of selecting Governments (o).

(m) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 405, 417 ff., 475—79.

(n) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 270 ff., 278; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 201 ff., 206 f., 254. The Conservatives were anxious not to defeat the Government themselves, as they did not wish to take office.

But whether there is any prospect of the existence of three parties, with any balance of strength, it is very difficult to say. The split of the Liberals in 1932—33 reduced the number of Liberals in the true sense, as opposed to Liberal Nationals, who are virtually a subordinate branch (p) of the Conservative party, to an almost negligible figure, twenty-one in all in 1935, and, despite the efforts made to recreate the party on an independent policy of encouraging liberty, security, and the diffusion of property, as opposed to the doctrines of capitalism or socialism (q), it may be doubted if the party, in view of its limited resources, can expect much accession of strength in the future. If so, the problem of three parties may not present itself in any substantial measure, for there is no reason to assume any serious development at an early date in the Independent Labour party, while the National Labour party has a merely formal existence (r), representing as it does no real popular sentiment.

(o) See Ramsay Muir, How Britain is Governed, for an argument for three parties. (p) In 1935 only 33 as against 387 Conservatives.

(q) This programme was asserted for the Liberal Conference of 1938.

(r) In 1935 only eight, depending on Conservative and Liberal National votes.

The connection between the party leader and the Premiership has been referred to above; it remains to consider how the rank of leader is achieved. The power of the party is shown in the fact that it is its members in Parliament, who in one way or another virtually select the leader, and they, of course, take into account the feeling of the supporters of the ministry in the country, as well as the views of those concerned immediately in the Parliamentary sphere. In earlier times any formal selection as leader was unknown. Sir R. Peel was tacitly followed in his leadership of the Conservatives by Lord Stanley and Lord George Bentinck. In 1874 Lord Hartington seems to have been chosen leader of the Commons, but it does not appear that he was adopted in any way as leader of the party as a whole (s). Mr. Gladstone, though he had in a sense retired from that position, obviously remained in the background as the inevitable head, when, thanks largely to his Midlothian campaign, it achieved victory in 1880 (t). The selection of Lord Rosebery as Prime Minister was preceded by consultations among the Parliamentary members of the party, which resulted in showing that he must be regarded as the real successor to Mr. Gladstone in their view, but the Queen acted on her own decision (u). On February 6th, 1898, the pre-eminence of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman was preluded by his election to lead the Liberal party in the Commons (x). This gave him a position, whence no intrigues availed to move him during the following years, and assured his acceptance as Prime Minister. The position still was as defined by Sir A. Chamberlain in 1911 (y); either house

(s) Letters, 2 s., ii. 374 ff.; Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 134 ff.

(t) Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 182 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 587 ff.

(u) Letters, 3 s., ii. 337, 371, 373.

(x) Lord Rosebery resigned October 6th, 1896. At the election of 1895 there had been no real co-operation with Sir W. Harcourt, but a hollow truce was patched up. In December, 1898, Sir W. Harcourt also resigned leadership: Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 113—25. The subsequent attacks of the Liberal League failed and destroyed Lord Rosebery's chance of office (ibid. 141 ff.). See Gardiner, Harcourt, ii. 488. Lord J. Russell in 1849 spoke of Mr. Disraeli as leader in succession to Bentinck: Letters, 1 s., ii. 216.

(y) Politics from Inside, pp. 380, 383, 386—96; Taylor, Bonar Law, pp. 150—55.

must select its own leader, and which of the two would become leader of the party would be left unsettled until the time came for the taking of office by the party, when the King would settle it by his decision as to whom he would ask to form a ministry.

Mr. Balfour's resignation on November 8th, 1911, of his leadership of the party, was not voluntary, in so far as it was the outcome of a prolonged campaign demanding that "Balfour must go" (z). The position then called for a selection, and the obvious candidates were Mr. A. Chamberlain and Mr. Walter Long. The latter, a Conservative of long service, was definitely hostile to Mr. Chamberlain, who was still a Liberal Unionist, had only joined the Carlton Club a short time before, and had, by his recent attitude in the question of the Parliament Bill, caused some resentment. Ultimately, when Sir E. Carson's refusal to stand was known, Mr. Chamberlain's offer to stand down if Mr. Long did likewise, let Mr. Bonar Law in as leader. The selection was decisive of Mr. Chamberlain's future, and probably it was an error from the party point of view, but the decision was definitely accepted by the party. Later, health reasons induced Mr. Bonar Law in May, 1921, to withdraw from the party leadership, which fell to Mr. Chamberlain, but the adherence of the latter to the fate of the coalition ministry, when the decision was taken by the party meeting at Carlton House (a) to go to the next election as an independent party, rendered his resignation inevitable. Mr. Bonar Law, in accepting provisionally the royal mandate to form a Government, took care to have his position, as head of the party, affirmed by the approval of a meeting of party supporters in both Houses (b). Mr. Baldwin, his successor, likewise received approval in like manner on May 28th, 1923, at the Hotel Cecil, and when he gave way to Mr. N. Chamberlain, the election of the latter as head of the party was declared by acclamation at a meeting to which were summoned not only all members of both houses who accepted the party whip, but also approved candidates and the executive committee of the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations (c). The addition of this body which is elected by the twelve divisional organisations of England, and those of Scotland and Northern Ireland, is a significant proof of the growing importance of the party organisation in the choice of leader.

(z) Dugdale, ii. 83—92. He notified the King formally.

(a) October 19th, 1922. See Taylor, Bonar Law, pp. 257 ff.; Dugdale, Balfour, ii. 355 ff.; Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 299 ff.; Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 276 ff.

(b) Lords, 152; Commons, 220; Parliamentary candidates, 67.

The Liberals have fared less satisfactorily. Lord Oxford held in 1925 that a leader, once appointed Prime Minister, in opposition retained his leadership until he determined to lay it down (d). But his defeat at the election of 1924 undermined his position, as it opened the way to the selection by the party in the Commons of Mr. Lloyd George to be their chief, and his position was immensely strengthened by his control over his political fund. Though he had given a handsome contribution for the 1923 and 1924 elections, he had done so without giving up control, and the effort of the National Liberal Federation in January, 1925, to secure an independent fund, naturally failed of success, when it was known that another fund actually existed, for the reasons which rendered it difficult to utilise it were essentially based on the desire of Mr. Lloyd George to use the fund as the means of securing his hold of the party. The issue came to a head in May—June, 1926, when Mr. Lloyd George chose to dissociate himself from the attitude of Lord Oxford and the rest of the Shadow Cabinet on the subject of the general strike. It is clear that Mr. Lloyd George saw in the episode an opportunity to blot out his coalition activities, and the injury then inflicted on the party, by standing out as a sympathiser with Labour aspirations, denied just consideration by the Government. The position of the leader of the party

(c) May 31st, 1937. See Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. 159 f, (d) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 358—71; Mallet, Lloyd George.

thus became hopeless, and Lord Oxford resigned rather than take part in any squabble. But Mr. Lloyd George was not fated to step into his place; the party leadership remains unfilled, while in the Lords in 1938 the Marquess of Crewe, in the Commons Sir Archibald Sinclair head the remnants of the party.

The Labour party adopted the plan of an annual election of a leader in the Commons (e), and the choice of the King therefore fell in 1924 on Mr. MacDonald, as the due head of the party in that House. This leadership thus confirmed, it remained unquestioned, and led to his second term of office in 1929—31, when he deserted his party, and the plan of electing a head was again resorted to (f). As has been seen, the selection of a head is now virtually binding on the Crown, when the issue of choosing a Prime Minister arises, for the party naturally expects that its selected representative shall receive the royal summons.

With the development of the party was bound up the use of the Press for the dissemination and formation of political opinion. It is significant of the early days of Lord Palmerston's activities that Whigs held that his unpopularity with The Times and other papers was a good reason for not having him at the Foreign Office (g). Under Melbourne's ministry (1835—41) Palmerston worked hard to secure editorial favour. While more Liberal Whigs in 1835 set the Morning Chronicle on its feet; though it came under more Radical control in 1839, Palmerston still kept in touch with it as with the Whig Globe, thus countering The Times and Morning Post (h). His connection with the Chronicle enabled him to maintain his (e) The intellectuals, pacifists and younger trade unionists from Scotland and Wales decided after the 1922 election gave the party 142 members to substitute Mr. MacDonald for Mr. Clynes; cf. Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 325 ff.; Clynes, Memoirs, i. 329 ff.

(f) Mr. Henderson was elected on August 28th, 1931, by the Parliamentary Labour party, on Mr. MacDonald becoming Prime Minister on August 25th. Mr. Attlee is in 1938 leader.

(g) Bell, Palmerston, i. 194, 200. On the power of the Press at this time cf. Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, i. 75.

(h) Bell, i. 256 f. 309.

views while in opposition against the grave errors of Lord Aberdeen's foreign policy, despite Lord John Russell's remonstrances (i). On the other hand, Lord Aberdeen had in The Times, under Mr. Delane, a warm admirer of his foreign policy, and a recipient of much valuable news (k). In 1848 the Peelites acquired the Chronicle to Palmerston's disadvantage, but in 1850 he secured support from the Morning Post which, Conservative in other aspects, admitted his foreign policy (l). Backing Palmerston and Protection, the Post came to have a circulation inferior only to The Times. Later he won some support from The Times itself. Naturally other parties aimed equally at Press support, and from the first we learn of management of the Press by members of the ministry (m). The necessity of keeping closely in touch with the Press was recognised by Mr. Lloyd George when he acquired the Daily Chronicle when fighting for his own hand. The power of the Press was used with deadly effect against Mr. Asquith during the war; he pointed out on May 2nd, 1916 (n), how all the errors and defects with which the ministry was charged had been brought against the ministry of Mr. Pitt and against the Duke of Wellington, but he forgot that the essential difference between that period and his own was that the Press had an enormous circulation and necessarily deeply affected public opinion. He himself on March 11th, 1918 (o), pointed to two essential facts, the process by which many newspapers fell under one ownership and the substitution of proprietors for editors in the control of the policy of the Press. Moreover, his difficulties through failure effectively to keep in touch with the Press were accentuated by the existence of the curious personalities of Lords Northcliffe and Beaver-

(i) Bell, i. 330.

(k) Bell, ii. 32 f. 117.

(l) Bell, ii. 33 f.

(m) In 1839 the Secretary to the Board of Trade and the Under-Secretary for Ireland were thus engaged; Bell, i. 257. Cf. under Peel, Clark, p. 216.

(n) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 229—31.

(o) Spender, ii. 232 n. 1. Lord Melbourne had likewise neglected to conciliate the Press. Sir C. Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain used in 1880—85 their Press connections to maintain their positions.

brook, with their personal ambition to determine policies. It is, however, plain from his experience that the weight of the Press in moulding opinion is serious (p).

It must not, of course, be over-estimated. The fact that the Press has been mainly anti-Labour has not prevented the progress of that party, and, though The Scotsman, the most distinguished of Scottish newspapers, in 1885 deserted the Liberals on the Home Rule issue, that did not prevent its readers remaining in large measure Liberal down to the war period. But the increase of the electorate presents a wide field for the activity of the Press by suggestion, and suppression of unsuitable facts. A very large proportion of the electorate never reads any newspaper where the issues are carefully balanced and both sides of questions fairly presented, and such papers have become even rarer than in the past. One effect unquestionably of the Press is to strengthen the tendency to make personalities more important for party allegiance than principles, and this aspect of the position is further strengthened by the practice of broadcasting (q), which brings a very small number of persons, mainly the actual heads of the party, into a direct touch with the ever-increasing mass of electors. The effect of the inculcation of political principles in simplified and convincing form by leaders already popular is doubtless to strengthen in their allegiance those who have already some affiliation, and to make that allegiance more and more dependent on admiration for the leader. On persons not already tending to any political attachment the result may be negative.

An important aspect of the party system is the existence of research departments (r) now possessed by all parties alike. Their importance is enhanced by the recent practice now being energetically extended by the Conservatives, late comers in this field, of intensive tuition at summer and Easter schools for those interested in politics. Their instruction is intended and is no doubt effective in giving them a definitive impetus to propagate their newly acquired knowledge orally. It is now widely admitted that continuous oral exposition, such as was initiated by the Labour Party, in informal meetings is the most effective way to keep a party together and that the mere issue of electioneering literature before an election, and the holding then of meetings, is quite inadequate for effective purposes.

(p) Beaverbrook, Politicians and the Press; Kennedy Jones, Fleet Street and Downing Street.

(q) Mr. Snowden's broadcast in 1931 was widely held to have done great damage to the Labour party.

(r) There is a Liberal Publication Department, and equally the Conservative and Labour organisations.

3. The Extent and Character of Cabinet Control.

It must be remembered that the members of the Commons have only limited opportunities of attacking effectively the policy of the Cabinet. The King's speech at the opening of Parliament affords one opportunity; twenty to twenty-three days are devoted to supply, when criticism is possible, of the matters covered by the votes put down, which are usually selected as desired by the opposition; on four occasions, when the House goes into committee to consider the three sets of defence and the civil estimates, motions may be brought forward if the ballot favours the mover, as when in 1937 foreign policy was debated on the civil estimates. On the motions for the Easter and Whit-Sunday adjournments issues can be raised (s), as they can be each night when the House is about to adjourn, and in cases of urgency, approved by the Speaker, a motion for the adjournment may be accepted and brought on at 7.30 p.m. A motion of censure by the opposition will certainly receive a due allocation of time, for a Government which shirks facing such a motion would lose standing in a very marked degree. Finally, legislative proposals afford a constant opportunity for criticism, both in principle and in detail.

(s) E.g., April 14th, 1938. The allegation in the Daily Worker that the Speaker had intimated that discussion on Spain would then be debarred was hotly criticised and declared a breach of privilege.

But this list of opportunities leaves after all comparatively little scope for members to raise issues other than those which the Government finds it necessary to submit to the Commons. When the ministry can act without legislation, the opportunities for criticism are reduced, and in the operation of prerogative or statutory powers a ministry has a very free hand. The essential feature of the exercise of these powers is that the ministry may take decisions, and then confront the Commons with a fait accompli. In these circumstances it is inevitable that the Commons should feel bound, if members of the Governmental party, to support the ministry in a much higher degree than in the case of legislation, which, in principle, no doubt, they must accept from the Government, but which in substantial detail they must claim the right to amend.

(1) Of the freedom of action by the Government in external relations affecting the Dominions there is abundant recent evidence, as well as much of older date. The Cabinet, despite the grave differences among the ministers, imposed on the Commons its South African policy in 1876—80, and Mr. Gladstone, after accepting from his predecessors the acquisition of the Transvaal, retroceded it after Majuba (t). The Commons was confronted by the results of Mr. Chamberlain's diplomacy and that of the Cabinet in the case of the South African war of 1899 (u). Again, in 1906, the decision to grant responsible government to the Transvaal was taken without Parliamentary control, and the use of the prerogative to establish any form of government in a conquered colony enabled the ministry to evade the obstacle of the House of Lords, which else would have prevented the carrying of the measure in question (x). The Irish surrender in 1921 was arranged by the Cabinet, and presented as a fait accompli for acceptance, though in theory the measure was one which should have been impossible of acceptance by the ministry (y).

(t) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 37 ff.
 (x) See p. 206, ante.

(u) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 400 ff.
 (y) Pakenham, Peace by Ordeal.

In the same year Malta was granted self-government by letters patent, not by Act of Parliament, as desired by the island, partly because of the delay which that procedure would have involved. Later, in 1932 and 1934, the constitution, which had been misused to the profit of Italy by the Italian leaders of the Government, with Papal support, was suspended, and then abandoned with merely formal acceptance of the necessary Acts by the Houses. Southern Rhodesia was likewise added by prerogative Order in Council and letters patent in 1923 to the Empire as a responsible Government colony, while the annexation of Kenya was likewise a prerogative act. More striking still the vital decisions, which conferred on the Dominions a status of equality in internal and external affairs alike with the United Kingdom, were taken without the slightest reference to Parliament, though by this action the whole established system of imperial control of foreign relations and internal government was swept away. The Report of the Imperial Conference of 1926, epoch making as it was, was never brought before the Commons for approval, and, when after further Conferences in 1929 and 1930 the finished result was presented in the Statute of Westminster, 1931, the Commons were told that the measure represented an agreed text which could not be varied without Dominion assent, so that all efforts to change it were voted down. Thus, even when legislation was necessary, it became so only at a stage when it was impossible to amend. Thus the control which the Commons can exercise even now over legislative proposals, even of a strong Government, by modification, disappears.

The position is interestingly illustrated by the decisions announced in the agreements with Eire of April 25th, 1938 (2). The British Government therein sacrificed all its rights in respect of defence in Eire, which had been regarded as essential in 1921, and it did so without receiving the slightest assurance that Eire would forbid any enemy occupying her territory, or using her waters as a base of attack on Britain. The refusal of Eire to give any such assurance was, of course, motived by the desire to compel Britain to surrender Northern Ireland, in which case a pledge of the nature indicated would be given, and no doubt it will be possible in this way to compel the exclusion of Northern Ireland from the United Kingdom in due course. Nevertheless, this accord was concluded without any prior hint of such a surrender being made, and Parliament had no option but to accept, or to eject the ministry from office.

(2) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5728; Keith, The Scotsman, April 27th, 1938.

(2) Nor is the position different in the sphere of external affairs. The foreign policy of Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell was no more controlled by Parliament (a) than that of Lord Beaconsfield with regard to Russia and Turkey, and it was essentially the dramatic interlude of the death of Gordon which suddenly brought about a bitter attack in the Commons, which shook the party majority (b). That it failed to do so is significant of the power even then of the Cabinet. The Commons accepted meekly the decisions of Lord Salisbury in the difficult period of the reconquest of the Sudan and the French Treaty of 1899 (c), and his attitude of concession in the Russian adventure in China, which was but feebly countered by the acquisition of Wei-hai-wei to match Port Arthur. In the same way the accord reached with Japan in 1902 was a Cabinet decision, and the remarkable entente concluded with France in 1904 was equally unexpected. Unlike the Japanese alliance the necessity of making some territorial changes led to the submission of a Bill to Parliament (d). The ministry thus set its seal on the precedent set in 1890 with the disapproval of Mr. Gladstone in the case of the surrender to Germany of Heligoland, and thus limited ministerial exercise of the royal prerogative as (a) In 1857 Palmerston on defeat successfully dissolved on his Chinese policy; in 1858 his defeat was due to a curious coalition; Bell, ii. 166 ff., 182 ff.

(b) Letters, 2 s., iii. 610, 614 ff.

(c) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 202 ff., 224 ff.

(d) Lee, Edward VII. ii. 252.

regards surrender of British territory. The precedent was duly followed in 1925, when Jubaland was surrendered to Italy, and in 1934, when the Dindings was handed over to Johore, but it is significant that in 1935 the Cabinet clearly held that a transfer of protected territory might be arranged without any intention of legislation (e). The Liberal Government in 1907 formed an accord with Russia without consulting Parliament, and the conversations with French officers, which committed Britain in effect to aiding France in the Great War, were not even communicated to Parliament. The Cabinet further had to determine on declaring war in 1914, and to confront the Commons with a decision already final. In like manner the Commons neither was given, nor demanded, any control over the negotiations in the course of the war, including the offer of Cyprus to Greece, and the secret treaties of 1915, and, while it was asked to vote the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, there was no possibility of it dealing with the terms of the peace. The Locarno Pact of 1925 was, indeed, submitted for approval, but only when it was final, and there remained no possibility of declining acceptance. The policy of disarmament was accepted and put into effect without any hint by the Cabinet that in 1934 it realised that it was leaving the country seriously underarmed (f).

The plenitude of Cabinet power is illustrated, even in what is often justly cited as an instance where public feeling compelled for the moment a change of policy. When in December, 1935, the terms of the proposals, devised by M. Laval and Sir S. Hoare, for the settlement of the Ethiopian issue became known, there was so much indignation (g) in view of their complete departure from the obligations of the League Covenant, that, though the Cabinet had hastily approved his suggestions, he himself realised that he had forfeited the confidence of the great body of public opinion in the country, and the proposals were dropped. But the apparent victory of public feeling was rendered illusory, when in June, 1936, it was found that Sir S. Hoare was back in the Cabinet in the important office of First Lord of the Admiralty, which gave him a powerful position in advocating a policy of retreat, and that Mr. Chamberlain was determined to destroy sanctions (h). It was plain, therefore, that, while the Cabinet had yielded, it had done so merely the better to carry out its policy of conciliating Italy. What must be severely condemned is the failure of the ministry to make it clear to Ethiopia that it would not secure an oil sanction, and that its support would never go so far as to shut out the possibility of maintaining cordial relations with Italy. For that failure a grave moral responsibility rests with the whole Cabinet, in which Mr. Eden, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. N. Chamberlain, and Sir S. Hoare bear chief responsibility.

(e) Keith, Current Imperial and International Problems, 1935—36, pp. 139 ff.

(f) Keith, Int. Affairs, ii. 175 ff. (Mr. Baldwin at Glasgow, November 18th, 1936).

(g) Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 508—11.

The helplessness of Parliament was well illustrated by the abandonment of sanctions, which was plainly a breach of a clear international obligation and involved some degree of national dishonour (i). In like manner the ministry determined the attitude of Britain towards the Spanish civil war, and the non-intervention agreement. Aware in full measure of the complete disregard of the Governments of Italy and Germany for the accord, and that its own refusal to allow the supply of munitions was serving to further the views of these two powers and to undermine the position of Britain in the Mediterranean, it persisted in its policy and enforced it by the application of full pressure to the party members. Finally, on February 21st, 1938, the ministry secured a triumphant majority for the policy of negotiating with Italy, though the Foreign Secretary and his Under-Secretary resigned rather than consent to accept an Italian ultimatum. In like spirit the ministry enunciated on March 24th its acceptance of the German annexation of Austria, and declined to give any promise of aid to Czechoslovakia if attacked by Germany. It is, however, fair to add that on this occasion Mr. N. Chamberlain used language which might be construed into a much needed warning that his process of retreat before the aggression of the dictators was not without possibility of modification, and it is quite probable that this modification of an original tendency to complete surrender was due to murmurings in the ranks of Conservative members. None the less the power of the Cabinet can hardly be exaggerated, when it is remembered that the ministry of 1935 had won the election on the strength of promises to support the League of Nations and collective security, which were now being deliberately violated in the Anglo-Italian agreement of April 16th, 1938.

(h) Toynbee, Int. Affairs, 1935, ii. 466 ff.

(i) Keith, Current Imperial and International Problems, 1935—6 pp. 182 ff.

As it is the Cabinet which decides, it matters little whether or not it formally consults Parliament. The decision of the Labour Government in 1924 (k) to lay all treaties before the Commons and to delay ratification for twenty-one days, a plan not followed by any save the Labour Government of 1929—31 (l), was no doubt a gesture to show its submission to the judgment of Parliament, but the Government was a minority one, and to carry through such a treaty as that with Russia (m), which it prepared, necessitated action by Parliament, which could clearly not be relied upon.

Secret treaties stand in a different light; even before the Covenant of the League of Nations declared treaties not binding until duly registered with the League (n), the binding character of a secret treaty was manifestly doubtful. The accords with Portugal and Germany regarding the future of the Portuguese colonies in 1898—99 were hardly consistent, (k) 171 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 2001 ff. Mr. Baldwin dropped the practice: 179 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 565.

(l) 230 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 408.

(m) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 2216, 2261.

(n) Art. 19. The secret clauses of the Treaty of 1904 with France are made light of by Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 50, but Lord Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 290 f., admits this view to be untenable.

but the Foreign Secretary in 1913 was clear that, if a new accord were achieved, it must be made public (o), and in 1906 (p) he took the sound view that an alliance with France could only be concluded if it were to be accepted by Parliament, for the British system did not allow one ministry to bind a subsequent ministry by arrangements without Parliamentary sanction. It is true that difficult questions of law might arise if such a treaty were made, but the constitutional principle is so notorious that no foreign power would be well advised if it sought to place any reliance in a treaty of alliance not sanctioned by the Legislature, or at least by the Commons.

(3) In other spheres also the Cabinet acts with definite authority. The movement of troops at all times is at its discretion, as is its disposal of the naval forces, effectively used by Mr. Churchill to prepare for immediate action on the outbreak of the Great War. It can give orders in emergency, secure of ratification by Parliament ex post facto, as when in 1847 and 1857 the Bank of England was authorised to disregard the terms of the Bank Charter Act, and in 1931 (q) to refuse to pay out gold; in the Grear War action often preceded, though but shortly, approval. Even in the field of the chief activity of Parliament, legislation, the tendency is more and more for the Cabinet to decide and the Commons to homologate. In April, 1938, secret purchases for defence purposes of wheat, oil and sugar were indemnified readily. There is, no doubt, some room for independence, and on occasion the ministry yields even on important points. In 1934 the protests of all kinds of people, from Conservative lawyers to Communists, created so strong a body of criticism that the Incitement to Disaffection Bill was severely remodelled before it passed Parliament (r). But it must be noted that

(o) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 307 ff.; Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 45; Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 366 f., 369 ff.

(p) Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 80 ff. Cf. A. Chamberlain's views in 1912 (Politics from Inside, pp. 425 f., 485 f.).

(q) Gold Standard (Amendment) Act, 1931 (21 & 22 Geo. V. c. 46).

(r) 24 & 25 Geo. V. c. 56.

the attack was largely based merely on too wide drafting; it is open to doubt if in effect the ministry sacrificed anything more than some of its dignity in the process. It is more common for issues of property and taxation to invoke serious trouble, and the reason is simple. The Conservative party is pledged to support the interests of capital and private property, and inroads thereon strike definitely at this essential doctrine. It is easy, therefore, to understand that Mr. N. Chamberlain's National Defence Contribution Scheme in 1937 came in for such serious objections on the part of members and outside organisations that the whole principle of drawing extra revenue from those companies which were to make extra profits from re-armament was abandoned, and the burden placed equally on those who made no profits. It may fairly be claimed that in their action the Commons showed themselves definitely more sympathetic to profiteering than might have been expected. An earlier occasion, when Mr. Churchill had to drop a petrol tax, was likewise marked by much lack of sound consideration; it proved, however, popular for members to represent themselves as opposing the taxation of the simple necessities of the poor, however fallacious the idea was. The power of capital over a Conservative Commons and a ministry is excellently shown in the discussions of 1938 on the Bill to provide for compulsory concentration of the coal mining industry. The demand conceded by the ministry that the matter of any compulsory scheme should be brought before a Parliamentary Committee was essentially based on the claim that otherwise private property might be affected without due consideration for the rights of owners. On the other hand, the successful steps taken in 1937 to limit the freedom of the executive to require the giving of certain statistical information in regard to marriage and births, was largely due to the ease with which an agitation can be worked up against any interference with the privacy of members of the public.

In no case, however, is a Government, under normal conditions, prepared to concede anything that it does not really approve as a desirable change, or accept as a graceful and popular concession. A ministry, it must be remembered, wins approval and admiration, not merely by strength, but by gracious consideration for the popular feeling. Moreover, ministries are not guiltless of the tactical cleverness shown in including in measures matters which they do not really desire to carry, but which they can make a virtue of conceding, while they secure thus the acceptance of clauses, which, put forward by themselves, might easily have produced serious controversy.

4. The Cabinet and the Electorate: Dissolution and Mandate.

The essential connection between the Cabinet and the electorate, already seen in the party system, becomes formally complete at each dissolution of Parliament, when the ministry seeks approval of its policy by the electors, and the opposition seeks likewise to secure for its rival proposals endorsement, and for its leaders office. If a Government is not prepared to dissolve, it confesses, as in 1885, 1895, and 1905, that it has no policy for which it can claim approbation, and so admits that it would be idle to return it to power.

(a) Dissolution or Resignation.

The view of Queen Victoria that a dissolution (^(s)) was an appeal to the people to strengthen by its approbation the Government favoured by the Crown, which Lord Melbourne no doubt shared, was even then out of date. It rested on a failure to appreciate the vital change introduced by the Reform Act, shown clearly in her statement in 1846, that "the Queen strongly feels that she made a mistake in allowing the dissolution in 1841; the result has been a majority returned against her of nearly a hundred votes." Since Sir R. Peel's time this view has died out. The attitude of the people to the Crown normally is wholly divorced from elections, whose object it is to allocate power to one party or other equally devoted to the interests of the country, and equally loyal, but differing in their view of the policy best calculated to serve the public interest at the moment.

(s) Letters, 1 s., ii. 91 f.; so Peel, ibid. 80. But the Queen in 1892 was wholly unwilling to accept the results of the election as determining her outlook; Letters, 3 s., ii. 127, 132, where she records her utter disgust at the change. That was really going too far, even for a partisan.

(1) The termination of Parliament, by efflux of time, demands since 1911 that there shall be an election every five years at least, in lieu of the seven years of the Septennial Act, 1716. This means, no doubt, that an election will normally fall after the end of the fourth annual session of Parliament. It is not necessary to regard, as wholly convincing, the arguments by which Mr. Baldwin settled the suitable time for the election of November 14th, 1935, but there was no doubt substance in his view that November is a convenient month, falling as it does before the epoch of Christmas shopping, which should not be affected by the existence of political movements. Moreover, it gives the ministry an uninterrupted session in the following year, when it is certain to have very important business to transact. At any rate it is probable that the precedent will be borne in mind, and will affect future practice. Dissolutions, however, based mainly on efflux of time, are few and far between. Lord Palmerston dissolved in 1865, virtually on an appeal for the return of himself and his ministry on grounds of personal respect. In 1874 (t) Mr. Gladstone had the consideration that the end of the period of Parliament was drawing near, as an additional incentive to appeal, and this consideration was reinforced by others. The House of Lords had shown itself inclined to reject his proposals, no doubt in part, because his mandate of 1868 was growing stale, and by-elections had been running against him. It is significant that in 1841 a different view of the conclusion to be drawn from adverse by-elections was drawn by Sir R. Peel (u), for he urged that the fact that sixteen out of twenty by-elections in the current Parliament had gone against Lord Melbourne, indicated that he ought to resign; he did not draw what later seemed obvious, that the sign thus afforded of popular disapproval of the ministry should be regarded as demanding an appeal for a popular verdict. In 1905 Mr. Balfour (x) defended, on the basis of all precedent, all law, and all common sense, the doctrine that it was for the Commons alone to determine whether a Government should remain in office, and denied that by-elections were, or ought to be, accepted as a test of public feeling. This intransigent attitude is characteristic of its author; the value of by-elections as a test of public feeling is often alluded to by Sir A. Chamberlain, and what is decisive, is the confession on November 12th, 1936, of Mr. Baldwin, that the fatal delay in 1934 in British re-armament, which sealed the fate of Ethiopia, Spain and Austria, was due to adverse by-elections, and the fear that their number would be augmented if the Government attempted to add to armaments. It was then that Mr. Baldwin enunciated the famous doctrine of the "time lag" (y) in the preparations of democracies, ignoring entirely the fundamental question whether ministers, who alone have full information on defence issues, are entitled to withhold information from the people, because they fear political disadvantages thence. If this doctrine, which seems to have excited remarkably little protest, is adopted, the dangers for democracies are patent and most grave. Rather, it seems that the plenitude of Governmental knowledge imposes on the ministry an immediate and most important obligation to impart such vital knowledge to the electorate. What is striking, is that when Mr. Baldwin did go to the people in 1935 he showed in his manifesto little appreciation of the gravity of the position, as it must have appeared to him and his colleagues. In 1829 he had copied Lord Palmerston in 1865, but unsuccessfully under the changed conditions.

(t) Morley, Gladstone, ii. 484—87; Letters, 2 s., iii. 303.

(u) 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 817 f.

(x) 141 Parl. Deb. 4 s., 160 ff., 181 f. So in 1904; 132 ibid. 1015 f. For his amazing tactics in 1905 in walking out to avoid defeat, see Dugdale, i. 410 ff.

(y) Cf. Keith, Int. Affairs, ii. 175 ff. Lord Newton's censure (Lansdowne, p. 113) of Mr. Asquith before the war falls very aptly against the ministry of 1931—35. For an apology for Mr. Asquith see Grey, Twenty-five Years, ii. 47—61.

In 1892 Lord Salisbury's appeal to the people was in part influenced by consideration of time, but his appeal was partly on the record of his ministry, partly on the desirability of securing a message of hope, not of ruin, to the people of Ireland in condemning Home Rule. So wholly did he fail to realise the essentials of the Irish situation.

(2) A more frequent cause of dissolution is defeat in the Commons on an issue deemed vital, the alternative being resignation, discussed below. The dissolution of 1831 on the Reform Bill was consequent on the fall of the Duke of Wellington's ministry in view of its failure to promise reform which, though not a direct issue at the election of July, 1830, had been widely canvassed in the country consequent, in part, on the French revolution. The failure of the Commons to accept the scheme of Earl Grey, who thus entered upon office to press for reform, resulted in the election of April, 1831, when the appeal to the people was not merely to return the Government, as in the case of W. Pitt's appeal in 1784, but to approve reform, and that too in the special form proposed by the ministry (2). In 1841 Lord Melbourne was driven to dissolution by a direct vote of no-confidence, and in 1857 Lord Palmerston dissolved on his defeat on his Chinese policy, and won as a sturdy imperialist a distinguished victory. Lord Derby, however, failed to win when he dissolved in 1859, and a like fate befell Mr. Disraeli in 1868, Mr. Gladstone on Home Rule in 1886, and Mr. MacDonald in 1924.

(3) A dissolution is equally necessary if, on the resignation of its predecessor, a new Government is formed. In theory it may be held, as Sir R. Peel did in 1841, that the endorsement of the electorate is not essential for the change, and in the

(2) Duke of Wellington, 7 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 1193; Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 201 f.

Dominions retirement of ministers, without a dissolution, has been held not to require a dissolution by their successors. But this has been due to considerations irrelevant under actual British conditions. It has been due to the existence of less effective party opposition through the existence of groups, which can coalesce to provide a ministry with an effective support in Parliament, so as to allow postponement of an election until the early expiration of Parliament, which has often had no more than three years' duration, rendering dissolutions so frequent that an extra dissolution, with its serious cost, is unpopular (a). Under modern British conditions such a result could be contemplated only if a three-party system of a serious and lasting character came into being. It would then be possible to argue, as Lord Oxford argued in 1923 (b), that the Sovereign should not, in the event of the defeat or resignation of a ministry, grant a dissolution to it or to its successor, if it were possible to arrange a working agreement to carry on in the Commons. But that condition of things manifestly did not exist in 1924, and the objections to denying the electorate a voice are of very great strength. A refusal would normally be possible, only if there were general agreement within and without the Commons that an election should be delayed pending further developments of the situation. Where the view of the people can be gathered without a dissolution it would be absurd to insist upon it.

Of dissolutions on the appointment of a new ministry there is that of 1847 accorded to Lord John Russell (c), because patently having taken over power a year earlier, because of Sir R. Peel's loss of Conservative support, owing to his attitude to the corn laws, he needed additional authority; moreover, the time element spoke in his favour. Lord Derby in 1852 (d) had a clear case, for it was plainly impossible to

(a) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions, i. 148 ff.

(b) The Times, December 19th, 1923.

(c) Letters, I, s. ii. 126 f. He deprecated frequent elections as making members subservient to electors. It was now that Mr. Macaulay was defeated on his vote for the Maynooth grant.

(d) Letters, I s., ii. 383—385.

carry on effectively, unless he could be reinforced, and his dissolution undoubtedly strengthened his ministry, though the opposition sections coalesced to defeat it on the budget. In 1885 (e) Lord Salisbury dissolved on Mr. Gladstone's resignation, but only after some delay, due to the fact that redistribution was then in process of being carried out, and a dissolution before it was complete would have been regarded as an effort to defeat an important reform finally agreed upon after royal intervention. He was therefore entitled to ask for pledges from Mr. Gladstone for facilitating financial business, and the Queen finally persuaded him to accept those proffered, which proved to be adequate in fact if not in theory. In 1895, after a vain attempt to urge that Lord Rosebery should dissolve, Lord Salisbury took the common-sense decision to do so, and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman followed his example in 1906, with excellent results. In 1931 the issue arose whether there should be a dissolution, which naturally had no attractions for the Labour party, whose trusted leaders had led it into inextricable disaster, whence they had emerged with office, leaving their quondam associates discredited; but the ministry was clearly entitled to appeal to the electors and, indeed, bound to do so. A complete change of the political position, without the assent of the electorate, would have been wrong, even if the ministry could have been assured by the opposition that it could rely upon it to support its essential policies, and that the opposition clearly had no right to do (f).

(4) In other cases a dissolution has been necessitated by the emergence of new issues of fundamental importance. In 1909 the rejection of the ministry's financial scheme of taxation raised definitely the question of the relations of the two Houses, and demanded a readjustment. The dissolution of 1910 was equally necessary to afford ground for asking the new King to agree to override the opposition to the Parliament

(e) Letters, 2 s., iii. 689 ff.

(f) Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. 193 ff.

Bill of the House of Lords. In 1923 Mr. Baldwin felt it necessary to ask for a mandate for Protection, and in 1931 the need for a fresh mandate was, as we have seen, unquestionable.

(5) In other cases the dissolution must be ruled as largely inspired by tactical reasons. In 1880 Lord Beaconsfield seems to have held (g) that an appeal would be successful, and in 1900, with much better judgment, Lord Salisbury (h) seized the opportunity of successes in South Africa to go to the country for the return to power of the victorious Government, though, in fact, nearly two years were to pass before the peace terms of Vereeniging gave a real settlement, after many painful vicissitudes and heavy losses. The dissolution of 1918 was, of course, destined to obtain full authority for the men who won the war to make the peace, but it was long overdue, for Parliament had been in being since the beginning of 1911, and its existence had been prolonged by special legislation (i), which was clearly not to be repeated when no longer justified by the urgency of the war.

It is interesting to note the complete contrast between present-day ideas and those of Sir R. Peel (k) on the issue whether it is wise to have dissolutions in time of high feeling in the popular mind. He objected in 1841 to the idea of Lord Melbourne not resigning, but instead seeking a new mandate by dissolution on the score that the ministry was inflaming the mind of the people on a dangerous issue like food. Mr. Macaulay gave the effective reply that agitation was created of and by the people, the issue being one which touched them essentially (l). Peel was rigid, however, on (g) By-elections at Liverpool and Southwark were favourable; Letters, s. 2, iii. 61.

(h) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 579, 589, 603 ff. For Lord Salisbury's views, Letters, 3 s., iii. 586. He was reluctant, apparently, because he thought the law of the pendulum should bring a reverse: Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, p. 262.

(i) 5 & 6 Geo. V. c. 100; 6 & 7 Geo. V. c. 44.

(k) 4 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 891 f. Cf. William IV. in 1831; Corr. of William IV. and Earl Grey, i. 179 ff.

(l) 58 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 817 ff., 850, 887.

this head, and disliked the idea of appealing, even on the issue of the corn laws. But the temptation to make use of popular excitement, and even to stimulate it into activity, is natural; as early as 1807 the Portland ministry worked up the “No popery” cry to secure additional strength by a dissolution, which under the views then prevailing was unnecessary, and in 1900 an appeal to patriotism was peculiarly in place, when the state of popular feeling is remembered. On the other hand, there are cases where tactical use of this weapon has, with some magnanimity, been refused. Certainly in 1878, after the seeming triumph of the Congress of Berlin, and the attainment of Peace with Honour, Lord Beaconsfield could have risked an election with very reasonable prospect of success, but the Cabinet decided against it as unjustifiable, when the majority in Parliament was secure, and Mr. Baldwin in 1926 certainly could have capitalised the unpopularity of the General Strike, and the accompanying disunion among the Liberals, to have won a complete victory. But it must be remembered that Parliament had only been elected in 1924, and that his action would have been politically unadvisable, since to add an election to the gravely disturbed condition of public feeling in the country would have been a decidedly provocative step. Instead the Premier endeavoured to embark on a course of conciliation and appeasement, exemplified in the influence brought to bear on the railway companies to make terms with their employees, whose action throughout had been gravely discreditable. It was only the pressure of his own party which drove him to legislation (m) on the position of trades unions in the case of a general strike, and even in that legislation he accepted amendments facilitating the compulsion indirectly of trade unionists to contribute to the political fund, despite the unfairness of that method of raising funds to be applied to purposes which many workers dislike. As against Mr. Baldwin’s forbearance on this occasion may be set, in the view of some critics, his opportunism in November, 1935, in taking advantage of the favourable conditions created by the Peace Ballot for appealing to the country on a policy of strict adherence to the League of Nations Covenant, and to the doctrine of collective security. In most cases, it may be feared, expediency will prevail.

(m) Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act, 1927 (17 & 18 Geo. V. c. 22).

The British system is essentially opposed to that of France (n), where dissolution is now in practice obsolete, and the Legislature lasts its normal period of four years. It is noteworthy that, even in the crisis of the war, Mr. Bonar Law (o) seems to have contemplated using the power to dissolve in order to secure a subservient party, though Mr. Churchill denounced this as "the most terribly immoral thing he had ever heard of," and Mr. Law was afraid that Mr. Asquith might use the power to solve in his own favour the crisis of November—December, 1916, which that statesman was not inclined to do (p). The absence of the power to dissolve has no doubt largely accounted for the power of control over ministers of Parliamentary committees in France (q), though there are other causes, such as the strength of the Senate, and the absence of the British rule confining financial initiative to the ministry alone. The idea of fixed dates is sometimes commended on the score that, given a definite term of office, a ministry can plan definitely for some time in advance, but the argument is of little weight. Moreover, the system of fixed elections does something to destroy continuity of public interest. The Presidential election, in particular, in the United States creates a great mass of political activity in the preceding months, to be followed by a considerable period of indifference. No doubt under the strain of modern conditions this has been less marked recently in the United States, but it was formerly conspicuous. To restrict the right of dissolution, by some constitutiona (n) Finer, Modern Govt., i. 665 ff.

(o) Beaverbrook, Politicians and the War, ii. 106, 124.

(p) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 273, 311 n. 1.

(q) Finer, ii. 872 ff.

principle, so as to lessen control over the Commons by the Cabinet, has been vaguely discussed, but no project has received serious backing or even discussion. Other means of lessening Cabinet domination will be denoted below.

It rests, therefore, with the Government to decide what issues it shall treat as vital, and as demanding that it must resign or dissolve if it is denied support thereon. It is, however, more and more the practice for ministries to restrict the freedom of the members, by insisting on making the vote a matter of confidence. The days are gone when the Melbourne ministry suffered repeated defeats with equanimity, and dissolved only when an actual vote of no-confidence was carried by a majority of one, after it had refrained from resignation on a defeat on the sugar duties (r). The coalition ministry in 1853 accepted minor defeats without serious difficulties. Lord Rosebery's ministry treated a defeat on the Address in 1894 (s) with calm, but the vote was a snap one, and though such votes discredit a ministry, or at least suggest that its members are slack in their allegiance, or the Whips rather below par, still resignation is by no means essential. It was more striking, when in 1905 Mr. Balfour was defeated on an Irish issue in Committee of Supply, without resigning or dissolving (t). The position, of course, is different when a Government is distinctly a minority Government, as in 1886, when Lord Salisbury advised Lord R. Churchill to make it clear that the Government would not treat private members' bills as raising issues of confidence (u). But he did not suggest indifference to the fate of governmental proposals. On the other hand, Mr. MacDonald in 1924 announced that his Government would not go out—or, we may presume, dissolve—on defeats, not on principle, but would do so if a vote of no-confidence was carried (x). In fact it was defeated ten times between January and August, (r) 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 817 ff., 850 ff., 1212 ff.; 59 ibid. 77 ff.

(s) Crewe, Rosebery, ii. 445; Letters, 3 s., ii. 382 ff.

(t) 150 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 49 ff.

(u) Churchill, ii. 136.

(x) 169 H. C. Deb., 5 s., 749 f.

and the defeat, which it deemed decisive, was one on a comparatively minor issue, which the Liberals were most anxious not to treat as one demanding resignation or dissolution (y).

It is, of course, clear that a vote of no-confidence is decisive. A ministry which remained in office thereafter would gravely embarrass the Crown, which would be placed in the dangerous position of continuing to act on the advice of ministers disapproved of by Parliament. Moreover, Parliament could refuse further supplies (z), and thus paralyse expenditure of essential funds. It would, no doubt, block all legislation and petition the Crown for the dismissal of the unworthy ministers, and menace them with impeachment, for a breach of essential convention would justify the adoption of any means to eject the Government. But such formal votes are few. In 1841 Lord Melbourne dissolved on such a vote; in 1859 Lord Derby was so defeated and resigned; in 1924 a like fate awaited Mr. Baldwin; in these cases the electorate had just decided. More often the defeat comes on a substantive issue; the ministry of 1846 fell on an Irish Coercion Bill, though its offence was on the corn laws; in 1852 the Whigs were defeated on the Militia Bill and resigned. The ministry of Lord Derby in 1852 resigned on defeat on the budget after a dissolution. Lord Aberdeen resigned in 1855 because the House carried Mr. Roebuck's demand for enquiry into the Crimean war. Lord Palmerston dissolved when defeated on his policy in China, and won in 1857; in 1858 he fell on the Conspiracy to Murder Bill, and resigned. Lord Russell's ministry in 1866 resigned on defeat on reform (a). Mr. Disraeli was defeated in 1868 on the Irish Church issue, and dissolved; when unsuccessful, he resigned. In 1851 (b) the Whig Government was defeated on a franchise motion in a small House; the impossibility of

(y) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 344 ff. The Government was no doubt riding for a fall.

(z) Cf. Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 256, 258, 266.

(a) Letters, 2 s., i. 323—332.

(b) Letters, 1 s., ii. 289 ff.

securing an alternative Government compelled it to remain in office. In 1873 (c) Mr. Gladstone, defeated on the Irish University Bill, resigned, but had to resume office for a like cause; next year defeated at the general election he resigned forthwith. Mr. Gladstone's fall in 1885 was on the budget; in 1886 he was defeated on the Home Rule issue, and dissolved, resigning after a general election. In 1895 a defeat on the vote for cordite ended the life of Lord Rosebery's ministry. In 1924 Mr. MacDonald dissolved on defeat on the Campbell prosecution issue, and resigned when the electorate gave its decision against him.

It is easy to see that the occasions on which action was deemed imperative by the ministry differed in character. The defeat of 1895 was of such a character that the ministry's resignation was clearly a matter due to the disintegration of the party, largely through internal dissension between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Commons. The budget defeat of 1885 (d) stood in a different position, for, as Mr. Gladstone insisted, precedent dictated that resignation was proper in such a case, but the ministry was also in other ways in process of disintegration (e). In the other cases the issues were equivalent to a vote of censure; no doubt that of 1873 might have been treated otherwise, but Mr. Gladstone had made it clear that the issue was one of confidence.

Whether a Government shall resign on a decisive vote or dissolve is a matter for it to decide in the light of all the circumstances. It is impossible to claim that dissolution is in any sense obligatory, and, indeed, the suggestion, which was made energetically in regard to the resignation of Lord Rosebery in 1895 (f), and of Mr. Balfour in 1905 (g), is

(c) Letters, 2 s., ii. 233, 246, 298, 318; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 447 ff.

(d) Letters, 2 s., iii. 664 ff.

(e) Tories and Nationalists combined to defeat the ministry. Lord R. Churchill's Tory democracy, like Mr. Chamberlain's radical programme, recognised the importance of the Irish issue; Morley, ii. 200 ff. Both appreciated the effect of the extension of the franchise in 1884, which added 1,762,000 voters.

(f) Letters, 3 s., ii. 525 f.

(g) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 186—91; Esher, Journals, ii. 120.

incapable of serious support. The idea must be that the Government is in office because of a mandate from the electorate, and that, when it finds that it cannot give it effect, it ought to restore to the electorate the right to pronounce what policy it desires to see adopted. So far the contention can be given weight, but the counter-argument is conclusive. To appeal to the electorate means to ask it to homologate some policy, and a ministry which is not prepared to ask for a mandate cannot properly appeal. In 1895 it was plainly impossible for the ministry to present to the electorate any definite scheme, for its members were far from united in spirit or aims (h). Thus, it was plainly better that the appeal should be made by those who had defeated the ministry, and who ex hypothesi had plans of their own to further. In like manner, when Mr. Balfour refused to dissolve in 1905, it was because he had no policy for which he could ask a mandate. No doubt, in both cases, the results of the dissolution, which the incoming ministry secured, were very unfavourable to the outgoing Government, but that merely shows that a party without a policy will always be at great disadvantage compared with one which has a policy. It is reasonable to say that it is very unwise politically for a party to have merely to resign, but it is impossible to say that there is any constitutional obligation upon it to dissolve.

In one matter of interest the waning importance of the Commons is plainly to be traced. In 1874 (i) Mr. Gladstone put before the Queen the issue, whether in view of the verdict clearly unfavourable of the electorate, he should resign or meet Parliament and permit the Commons to perform its constitutional duty of deciding the fate of the ministry. In 1841 despite patent defeat at the polls, the ministry met Parliament, to be there ejected. In 1868, however, Mr. Disraeli innovated, and the Queen concurred in the view, that the dignity of the ministry and the public interest were best served by resignation without meeting Parliament (k). The reasons are plain: the new Government should be formed as early as possible, and should frame the royal speech to intimate the course of legislation. The presence of a discredited Government in Parliament can serve no purpose, and may in time of foreign crises be a positive danger. Thus, in 1874, the Queen had no hesitation in encouraging Mr. Gladstone to resign forthwith, and thus save three weeks' delay. The example set was naturally followed by Lord Beaconsfield in 1880, by Mr. Gladstone in 1886, and by Mr. MacDonald in 1924. In all these cases the verdict of the electorate was clear. In 1886 Lord Salisbury met Parliament, but there was certainly room for doubt as to whether he could be defeated, and the actual vote was on an amendment to the address, which advocated the famous policy of "three acres and a cow" (l). In 1892 it certainly seemed clear that Mr. Gladstone would be supported by the Irish party, but the margin, even in that event, was so small, that the decision to wait for a vote by the Commons could not seriously be questioned, and it was given on a no-confidence amendment (m). In 1924 it must have been clear enough that the Liberals would support the Labour party against Mr. Baldwin, but to retain office until actually ejected on a no-confidence motion was perfectly in order (n). A much more delicate situation existed in 1929, for the Government might have hoped to secure support from the small Liberal party, which had fared so badly in the Labour régime of 1924, that it might well hesitate to put Labour once again in power. But Mr. Baldwin was not in the least inclined to seek Liberal support, and instead decided (o) that the verdict of the electorate meant "that whether they wanted the hon.

(h) Letters, 3 s., ii. 316 ff., 322 ff.

(i) Guedalla, i. 444—7. The official visit of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh was a very conclusive reason for the Queen to wish the change of Government at once.

(k) Letters, 2 s., i. 556 f.

(l) Letters, 2 s., iii. 706 ff.; for Mr. J. Collings' amendment, 3 s., i. 21 ff.; Morley, ii. 288 f.

(m) Letters, 3 s., ii. 128 ff.

(o) 261 H. C. Deb., 5 s., 535.

(n) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 342 ff.

members opposite or not, they certainly did not want me, and I was going to get out as soon as I could. My colleagues agreed with me." It must be remembered that the election had deliberately been fought by the party on the personality of their chief, rather than on any very reasoned programme, and this explains his personal feeling of rejection.

In certain cases, of course, a Government may admit that censure is just without resignation or dissolution following. But these are wholly exceptional, being based on the fact that, while a minister normally commits his colleagues by his laches, it remains possible for them to dissociate themselves from his errors. There is a classic instance in Lord Ellenborough's resignation, when he wrongly authorised publication of a severe despatch to the Governor-General of India in 1858, and when in dealing with the vote of censure thereon based, the ministry did not justify his action, though it found excuses for it (p). The censure by the Commons in 1864 of the Education Department for withholding parts of the reports of the inspectors resulted in the resignation of Mr. Lowe, who would, had he wished, have been defended by the ministry; he demanded an inquiry, which exonerated him, and the vote was then rescinded (q). Lord Westbury next year resigned on a resolution finding laxity in dealing with an appointment in the Bankruptcy Court at Leeds (r). In later instances actual censure has been evaded, as when in 1873 (s) Mr. Gladstone effected an exchange of ministries, consequent on irregularities regarding the practice of accounting in the Post Office. Prompt resignation by Col. Seely in 1914 (t) ended the crisis induced by his apparent surrender

(p) Martin, Prince Consort, ii. 221—32; Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 304—8; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 188 ff.

(q) Martin, Sherbrooke, ii. 226. Lord Granville resigned, but withdrew resignation later; Fitzmaurice, i. 431.

(r) Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 479 ff. The Lord Chancellor had already been attacked on the Edmunds' case.

(s) Guedalla, i. 420 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 461 ff.

(t) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 44. Mr. Birrell resigned on the Irish rebellion issue (April, 1916: Spender, pp. 213 f.), but not Sir G. Cave on the London police strike, though he offered to do so (Mallet, pp. 20, 216 f.).

of principle in regard to the claims of the officers in Ireland to be allowed to attach conditions to their obligation of obedience to orders. The unfavourable comment of the Mesopotamian Royal Commission on the conduct of the campaign resulted in Mr. A. Chamberlain's resignation in July, 1917, as a gesture, asserting the principle that the head of a department is responsible for defects of a subordinate Government; in 1938 Mr. Ormsby Gore admitted his technical responsibility for misgovernment in Trinidad, but no one thought of his resignation; the tragic horrors of the Mesopotamian case differentiate its treatment. Mr. Montagu in 1922 (u) relieved the ministry, by hasty resignation, from attack based on his error in permitting publication of a protest from the Government of India against the Turkish policy of the British ministry. The resignation of Sir S. Hoare has been noted; it clearly saved the ministry from the difficult position of having to face an attack which had the sympathy of a large number of members of the Government party, whose views were moulded or strengthened by those of their constituents.

It is also possible to escape serious attack by the device of arranging for inquiry. There is the famous episode of Mr. Roebuck's motion as regards the Crimean war, which brought down the Aberdeen ministry on Lord John Russell's defection. Lord Palmerston (x) accepted it as unavoidable, but it cost him forthwith Mr. Gladstone, who was convinced that such an inquiry was an abuse of the powers of the House, and might prove dangerous. This is clearly an exaggerated view, though there is something to be said (y) for the opinion, that the wiser plan is to appoint a Royal Commission, as was done during the Great War in respect of the Dardanelles and Mesopotamian fiascos. Alternatively, a tribunal of inquiry under statute has great advantages. This was illustrated conspicuously in the case of the leakage of budget information in 1936 (z), for the report of the judicial body appointed laid blame on Mr. J. H. Thomas, whose immediate resignation relieved the ministry from any attack. On the other hand, in 1918, the ministry, after first promising a judicial inquiry into the truth of certain allegations brought by Sir F. Maurice against statements of Mr. Lloyd George, as to the strength of the British forces in France, withdrew the proposal, and saved itself by an energetic exertion of its Cabinet authority, doubtless because it realised that such an investigation was certain to disclose unpalatable facts, for the minister had undoubtedly given information to the Commons, which conveyed a false impression, and concealed his own action in refusing to give Sir D. Haig the necessary reinforcements (a).

(u) Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 267 f. For Wyndham's resignation in 1905 see Dugdale, Balfour, i. 415 ff.

(x) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 115; Morley, Gladstone, i. 537 ff.

(y) The Select Committee on the Jameson Raid failed to elicit vital papers, and thus has left it open to believe that Mr. J. Chamberlain was privy to the Raid, a point which ought to have been cleared up. As it is, the issue cannot be decided. Cf. Garvin, iii. 95—125, who unconsciously makes grave admissions; Esher, Journals, i. 193—8, 211; Spender, Life, i. 79 ff.

In yet other cases the ministry may appeal to the House to forbear from investigation or demands for information on the score that it is not in the public interest that disclosures should be made. Hence the ministry is not questioned on the expenditure of secret service funds, and the amount demanded is voted without discussion. Most striking of all, it has been agreed by the Commons not to question the use made of the enormous sum placed under Governmental control as the Exchange Equalisation Fund. Moreover, on details of defence preparations the ministry is permitted to preserve complete silence, as is shown by the replies of Sir T. Inskip to all efforts in 1937—38 to extract from him encouragement as to the effectiveness of new British armaments, or types of aeroplanes. The ministry in like manner escapes severe pressure regarding its detailed plans for defence; whatever the degree of scepticism felt as to their efficiency, the Commons will not press a minister to go beyond his statements of what it is safe to reveal. Hence from time to time the suggestions made that the Commons should hold a secret session to discuss such issues as the state of the air defence scheme, but the proposal, which was occasionally acted on during the Great War (b), has never in peace been adopted. The opposition may comment on the vital change from Mr. Baldwin's view of the necessity of equality with Germany in the number of first line aircraft to Mr. N. Chamberlain's insistence that other factors must be taken into account, such as reserves, productive capacity, and quality of airmen, but even Mr. Churchill had to rest content with the assurance that all matters relevant had fully been weighed. No doubt many Conservatives share his doubts as to the soundness of British policy in this regard, but it would have been wholly contrary to precedent to question the issue further in the Commons. Only in the case of domestic action has the issue been pressed as regards troop and ship movements, as it was in the famous controversy over Mr. Churchill's attitude (c) towards the means to be taken to suppress any attempt in Ulster to resist, by armed force, the authority of the Crown during the controversy over Home Rule.

(z) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5184.

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 303 ff. Mr. Asquith's objection to a judicial enquiry, and preference for a Select Committee was characteristic, as in the case of Mesopotamia in 1917; ii. 294 f. Cf. Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 675.

(b) The Mandate.

The precedents and logic alike make it clear that the electorate should be asked to decide on any vital steps in policy, external or foreign, and it is interesting to trace the manner in which this doctrine has been established, and the extent to which it receives effect. It is clear that before the Reform Act of 1832, and the operation of the modern party system, dissolutions were merely in form appeals to the scanty and artificial electorate. Lord North's advice to dissolve in 1774 (d), like that of Lord Grenville in 1806, was palpably intended not to elicit popular sentiment, but to add to the majority of the ministry by an adroit appeal. The opposition to reform was countenanced by W. Pitt, as he developed from the broader sentiments of his younger days, while Fox became more and more conscious of the failure of the existing system to express the views of the public. The famous victory of Pitt in 1784 cannot any longer be regarded as the result of an appeal to the people to decide principles. The decisive factor therein was the hostility of the East Indian influence to the projects of Fox and North, the whole-hearted aid of the King's "friends," who might number a hundred, and the loss of support for Fox due to his rather unprincipled alliance with Lord North (e).

(b) April 25th and 26th, 1916, on compulsory service; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 210.

(c) World Crisis, 1911—14, p. 181; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 42.

(d) Corr. between George III. and Lord North, i. 219.

A real issue was presented in principle, and even in some detail in the election of 1831, when the electorate was asked to give a vote for a special form of reform definitely indicated by the fate of the Reform Bill in the Commons. The logical result of the reform was to render inevitable the gradual increase of popular sovereignty, though the course of advance was slow, and further progress waited until 1867, to be carried further in 1884—85, and extended to the full as late as 1918 and 1928. Moreover, until the Ballot Act of 1872, voters with open voting could easily be intimidated, and bribery (f) flourished, until checked by Acts of 1854 and 1883, and only in 1868 were election petitions consigned to decisions by the Courts. But the election of 1834 brought forth from Sir R. Peel a manifesto addressed to the electors of Tamworth, his seat, but published for general guidance, which gave the principles, and even some details, of the measures he intended to carry, while a contemporary electoral tract by E. L. Bulwer brought home to the electorate that they were being asked to vote for principles, not men only. Sir R. Peel soon repented of his attitude, and denied in 1841 the propriety of (e) Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 196—98.

(f) St. Alban's merited disfranchisement by £24,000 bribery from 1832—54. Cf. Disraeli's boast of £40,000 spent at Maidstone; Parker, Peel, ii. 487. See Askwith, Lord James, pp. 60 ff., 117 ff.

Lord Melbourne appealing to the people on principle, and in preparing in 1845 (g) for the repeal of the corn laws, he deliberately declined to appeal to the electors because he did not think it proper, thus to excite a bitter conflict between different classes of society, in lieu of allowing dispassionate consideration by the Commons. Mr. Disraeli (h) at once attacked him bitterly for his failure to let the people decide instead of inducing a Parliament, the majority of which was elected to defend Protection, to adopt Free Trade, but Sir R. Peel showed no sign of accepting this contention, though he admitted that, if he had failed to carry Free Trade, he would have dissolved, rather than accept the status quo. But that did not prevent him from issuing a manifesto of policy for the election of 1847, a plan adopted also by Lord George Bentinck for the Protectionists and Lord John Russell for the Government.

Mr. Disraeli was destined to violate the principle he had upheld against Sir R. Peel. In 1866 he defeated Mr. Gladstone's Reform Bill on the score that it went too far, but, on Lord J. Russell's resignation against the advice of Mr. Gladstone in favour of dissolution as the more constitutional course, he himself carried in 1867 a much wider measure, certainly without mandate. In 1868, however, on his defeat on the Irish Church issue, he decided to dissolve to test the will of the electorate, while Mr. Gladstone was driven to urge resignation as appropriate, an untenable doctrine, ill-based on the events of 1846. The election thus came to turn in a manner almost unique on a single issue, which did not deeply affect in any material way the interests of the electors in Great Britain. Yet neither protagonist in the controversy of 1873 (i) over the issue of the duty of Mr. Disraeli to take office on Mr. Gladstone's resignation on the defeat of the Irish University Bill, which ended in the refusal of Mr. Disraeli to accept office, took the obvious point that it was proper to give the electors the opportunity of deciding the policy of the country, which could not be safely left in the hands of a ministry severely discredited by a vital defeat. Mr. Disraeli was naturally chiefly moved by the consideration that his rival was in serious difficulties of several kinds, that by-elections were going against him, and that it was safe to assume that, if he were compelled to carry on in these circumstances, the time would shortly come when a dissolution would be forced on him, when the electors would have their chance to turn to him for guidance.

(g) Memoirs, ii. 163 ff.

(h) 83 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 122.

(i) Paul. Mod. England, iii. 310 ff.; 214 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1931 ff.; Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 218, 253; Morley, Gladstone, ii. 442 ff.

A further advance in the doctrine of mandate was made in 1872 (k) by Lord Salisbury, of all people. He was moved to it by the Ballot Bill, which was certain to diminish the power of landlords to intimidate their tenants, and urged that the Lords should assume the duty of ensuring that the Commons should not transgress its mandate from the electors. In 1884 (l) he renewed the same specious attack in regard to the Reform Bill, which was to add to the electorate some two million voters, about the same number as that due to the Acts of 1832 and 1867, and which would widely extend the possibility of Liberal victories in the country areas. The position was obviously open to the accusation that it sought to give to the Lords the right to force a dissolution, and in the result, as the prospects of such a dissolution appeared dubious, and as the Queen intervened, the issue was amicably settled, a Redistribution Bill being agreed upon to accompany the enactment of the Representation of the People Act. In 1886 (m) Lord Hartington took up the cudgels for the mandate, though characteristically he repudiated the name, on the score that Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule scheme was not made an issue at the general election, where he had apparently stood for nothing more than enlarged powers of local government. It is impossible to regard Mr. Gladstone's defence of his position as convincing (n), and, in fact, on the defeat of his Bill, two months later, he readily dissolved and appealed for a mandate for Home Rule (o).

(k) 211 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1494 f. Cf. Gladstone's reference to opposition in 1874; Letters, 2 s., iii. 303 f.

(l) 290 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 468 f.

(m) 304 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1241 ff.

The issue of the mandate, which thus seemed well established, was revived after the election of 1900, when the Education Act of 1902 introduced, with the doubting discouragement of Lord Salisbury, the principle of placing on the rates the maintenance of denominational schools, and thus evoked a bitter religious controversy. There was also grumbling with legislation as to liquor licences, which gratified that industry by giving a valuable interest in place of a tenancy at pleasure. But on the issue of tariff reform the doctrine of mandate was accepted by both sides, as well as by Mr. Chamberlain (May 15th, 1903). Indeed, Mr. Balfour ingeniously dwelt on it as precluding action in the current Parliament, and finally advanced to the extreme doctrine that a general election should precede discussion of tariff reform with the colonies, and a second election, its being made operative. Finally, Mr. Balfour resigned, refusing to dissolve, and the Liberals received a clear mandate of a wide character from the electorate (p).

At this point, however, the House of Lords revived the doctrine of Lord Salisbury in 1872 regarding the necessity of a clear mandate for legislation. It rejected the Education Bill (q) and the Plural Voting Bill, and naturally the Conservatives denied absolutely the validity of the claim made in June, 1907, that the power of the Lords to alter or reject Bills "should be so restricted by law as to secure that, (n) 304 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1547; Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 223 f.; Morley, Gladstone, iii. 313 ff., 337 ff. In 1893 the Duke of Devonshire went so far as to demand a mandate for an actual Bill; 17 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 30 f.

(o) Speeches, ix. 128 ff.

(p) For admissions see 123 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 178; 131 ibid. 678 f.; 141 ibid. 120 f., 190, 338.

(q) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 458 ff.; Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 456 ff., who admits the cynical opportunism with which the Lords accepted the Trade Disputes Bill.

within the limits of a single Parliament, the final decision of the Commons shall prevail." The Prime Minister most emphatically repudiated the idea of the referendum, mandate, or plebiscite, and seemed to claim that a Parliamentary party successful at an election, should be able to pass such legislation as it thought fit. In this doctrine he was no doubt sincere, for he had denied in 1900 that the Government of the day needed a new mandate to make peace; moreover, his doctrine was shared by Lord Morley, who in 1902 had dissented from the argument of his colleagues, that a mandate was necessary for the Education Act, and who, on the Finance Bill of 1909 and the Parliament Bill of 1911, was again to deny the validity of the doctrine (r). It would plainly have been far more reasonable to allege that the mandate actually received covered educational reform and the abolition of plural voting (s), and to take the view that anything reasonably brought before the people at the general election or arising then should be admitted as proper. The dangerous nature of the wider claim was properly stressed by Sir W. Anson, and the Government itself respected the self-limitation of its action as regards Home Rule imposed by its electoral appeal (t).

In 1909, however, the Lords insisted on refusing a second reading to the Finance Bill until it had been submitted to the judgment of the country, which raised definitely the right of the Lords to compel a dissolution. As Lord Courtney pointed out, its earlier action did not compel a dissolution, but intervention in finance did, but Lord Curzon insisted that the Lords must have the right to reject, and so compel reference to the electors on any Bill in flagrant conflict with the expressed will of the electors, or which had never been brought before them (u). The issue was ultimately settled, (r) 4 H. L. Deb., 5 s., 1142; Emden, The People and the Constitution, p. 301.

(s) It was greatly limited by the Representation of the People Act, 1918.

(t) 176 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 911, 918, 1002. See also Anson, Parliament (ed. Gwynn), p. 329.

(u) 4 H. L. Deb., 5 s., 731 ff., 1139, 1260, 1345.

so far as the Lords was concerned, by the Parliament Act, 1911, and the loss of power to deal with finance measures was no doubt just, for the claim of a wealthy hereditary House to dictate financial policy is one repugnant to moral and political common sense.

In 1910 prior to the election resolved upon to secure a mandate for the Parliament Bill, the election of January, 1910, not having been fought directly on this issue, the text of the Bill was circulated, though it could not be discussed. The claim made by Mr. Asquith, Lord Loreburn, and Lord Haldane that a complete mandate had been obtained was really unanswerable, and the counter-arguments of Mr. Balfour, Sir W. Anson, and Lord Curzon will not stand examination (x). The contention that the Conservatives had not had time to criticise was frankly absurd, for the Bill was brief and clear, and that the issues were not simple, followed obviously from the fact that there was a general election. Lord Salisbury had discounted the Liberal mandate in 1892 on this ground (y). Nothing can make that fought on any one issue; to put it at the lowest, an unsatisfactory candidate will lose what a sound man would hold as of course. The real point was that the Liberal majority rested largely on the Irish Nationalists, who were voting in order to secure Home Rule, whereafter the British constitution would mean little to them, but for the Conservatives the fatal logical difficulty was that they demanded the retention of union, and that being so they could not object to a majority, however much it rested on Irish votes. Any argument (z) based on this fact is therefore untenable. The further vehement claim that the ministry had, despite the passing of the Parliament Act, 1911, no mandate to pass a Home Rule Act is equally untenable. No person in his sound senses but knew in 1910 that the Irish Nationalists and the Liberals were co-operating to pass the Parliament (x) They are fairly summed up by Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 233—34.

(y) Lady G. Cecil, iv. 403.

(z) Apparently accepted by Emden, p. 234.

Act as the indispensable condition of proceeding to Home Rule (a). To demand that the detailed proposals should be laid before the electorate, as the Duke of Devonshire had done in 1893, was to misunderstand the function of Parliament and the electorate. The duty of the electors must be to approve principles, of Parliament to give shape to the principles. Otherwise every change of substance could be seized upon and a further reference to the electors demanded.

The doctrine of mandate suffered in the Parliament of 1918, when female suffrage was carried, though certainly the issue had not been conceded in 1910. It may be said that the conversion of many opponents, such as Mr. Asquith (b), and wide approval of thus rewarding women for their work in the war might be deemed to approve the step taken. But the action of the Government in 1921 in departing abruptly from all earlier doctrines, and in conceding Dominion status, with absolute control of tariffs to the Irish Free State, at the demand of men briefly before described as the murder gang, could claim no mandate (c). It was also hotly disputed among Conservatives whether the grant of equal suffrage in 1928 was justified, for the electorate certainly had not been conscious in 1924 that it was being called upon to homologate this step. But it appeared that the Prime Minister considered himself bound by what he had said prior to the election.

In 1923, however, Mr. Baldwin explicitly emphasised the necessity of a mandate for a policy of protection, and declined to proceed in any other manner than a straightforward appeal to the electors. In his ministry of 1924—29 he declined to introduce protection because he had not asked for any mandate. The ministry of 1931 asked for a wide mandate, and it is quite possible to hold that they were justified in introducing wholesale protection on the strength of it. But

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 355 f.; ii. 13 ff.

(b) Spender, op. cit. ii. 297.

(c) Asquith had urged Dominion status in 1920; Spender, ii. 332; Keith, Letters on Imperial Relations, 1916—35, pp. 18 ff.

the ministry of 1935 (d), in asking for a mandate based on the maintenance of the League Covenant and the doctrine of collective security, prepared serious trouble for itself. In a brief period the flagrant violation of the Covenant involved in the Hoare-Laval terms for Ethiopia resulted in a wide protest among its own supporters, and for the moment the resignation (December 18th) of the minister primarily responsible seemed to show respect for the mandate. But in June, 1936, Mr. N. Chamberlain denounced the régime of sanctions and forced their withdrawal, thus clearly violating the Covenant. In 1938, matters went from bad to worse in this regard, for Mr. N. Chamberlain agreed to negotiate with Italy on the basis of the recognition de jure of the conquest of Ethiopia, in flat defiance of the League Covenant, and acquiesced in the annexation of Austria as soon as his firm protest had been firmly rebuked by Herr Hitler. That such steps should be taken without according reference to the electorate, as claimed by the leaders of the Labour party (e), is certainly a remarkable assertion of the right of a party elected on a definite mandate to ignore it. That Labour did not press still further its protest is no doubt due to appreciation that this precedent will enable it, when it secures power, to go at will beyond the terms of the mandate without any possibility of effective Conservative protest. It must be doubted whether it is compatible with elementary principles of political morality to obtain power on the strength of one policy, and thereafter to disregard utterly the doctrines on which office was obtained. The protests of Lord Halifax that it could be shown that the action taken was consistent with the promises given suggest a casuistry, whose adoption was damaging to the Conservative cause. The further allegation that the attitude of the Government had popular approval suggested the unanswerable proposal that the Government should undertake to appeal to the people as to the acceptance of such terms as it might arrange with Italy (f). To confront a country with a fait accompli in foreign affairs is a policy fraught with the gravest danger to the State, and destructive of national security.

(d) Toynbee, Int. Affairs, 1935, ii. 50 ff., 65.
 (e) House of Commons, April 4th, 1938.

5. The Formulation of Issues.

It is with the Reform Act of 1832 that the question of formulation of issues really begins. Isolated examples of criticism of prospective policy are earlier known, as the election of 1701 on William III.'s policy of war with France, and the Tories sought ineffectively in 1722 to condemn the Whigs for the passing of the Septennial Act, 1716, with its deprival of the electors of their then due right to pronounce on the ministry. Even after 1832 the Duke of Wellington could advise Sir R. Peel to go to the country on the issue whether he should remain Prime Minister, though Peel himself thought free trade and the destruction of protection was the true issue (g). In 1857 Lord Palmerston virtually asked for a vote of confidence in himself (h), and Lord Derby in 1859 deliberately made the issue a personal one. Lord Palmerston, who protested, himself did likewise in 1865. Lord R. Churchill (i), with some exaggeration, but also substantial truth, regarded the election of 1886 as a personal appeal of Mr. Gladstone for a vote of confidence in him. This was natural, for the Irish issue was already dividing deeply his party.

Confused issues are obviously inevitable, for both ministry and opposition can appeal to past successes or mismanagement and to future policy. In 1837, the Whig ministry extolled its past, the opposition suggested the evils it would do; in 1841 the ministry denounced the protectionist character of the opposition, while it concentrated on the bad record of the ministry. In 1874, Mr. Gladstone stressed the possible

(f) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5726. See Commons, May 2nd, 1938.

(g) Peel, Memoirs, ii. 295.

(h) Morley, Gladstone, i. 564.

(i) Churchill, ii. 495.

removal of the income tax, Mr. Disraeli denounced his blunders and failures. The position is characteristic of the two men, for the Liberals were in the nature of things bound to activity in reform, the Conservatives to insistence on the merits of their administration, or the demerits of their opponents. But in 1880 Lord Beaconsfield devised a new tactic; his record had been chequered and was ignored, but he curdled the blood of the electors by denouncing the destructive character of Home Rule as the disintegration of the realm (k). As Mr. Gladstone was far from having adopted Home Rule then, he was perfectly justified in condemning (l) this new device, and insisting that it was a complete innovation to make an election turn on the demerits of a supposed policy of the opposition. On the other hand, after 1886, the policy of Lord Salisbury in 1892 in appealing on his record and on hostility to Home Rule was plainly just.

Necessarily, with the extension of the electorate and the change in the British attitude towards social services, evinced best in the Liberal ministry of 1906, the appeals of all parties are rich in suggestions of direct benefit to the people. Those of 1923 all strike that note, for the Conservatives promised to enrich national life by tariff reform, Labour a national levy for social betterment, and the Liberals a credit system, while the Labour and Liberal parties denounced tariff reform unsparingly (m). In 1929 it proved fatal to the success of Mr. Baldwin that he could not hold out any panacea for unemployment, while the opponents stressed their rival schemes in this regard. In 1931 and 1935 alike the parties each stressed the social advantages of their plans, and the importance attached to maintenance of the social services is shown by the fact that the budget of 1938, despite the enormous burden of defence expenditure, cheerfully added generously to the already colossal total of social services, the ministry, no doubt wisely, recognising that to stint the latter in favour of the former would be the best way to accumulate unpopularity. The modern habit of soliciting votes by wide promises of gain is, of course, a commonplace in the Dominions, but even there it is often productive of harm, nor does it seem that its adoption in Britain is likely to add to the standard of public life. It must be added that in the actual electoral combats candidates show often the most singular generosity in interpreting the intentions of their leaders, and lend themselves deliberately or accidentally to the propagation of the most far-reaching promises. On the other hand, opposition candidates will freely exaggerate the promises made by their adversaries with the aim of discrediting them, either as impossible or as destined to bring upon the country the disasters from which it was saved only by the self-sacrifice of the Prime Minister in 1931 in consenting to form a national Government.

(k) Emden, The People and the Constitution, p. 248.

(l) Speeches in Scotland, ii. 21 ff.

(m) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 342 ff.

Difficulties naturally present themselves in the way of framing policies in the case of a ministry which takes office on the resignation of an earlier ministry, but they can be exaggerated out of all reason, as they were in the classical instance of Mr. Disraeli's arguments to justify his refusal in 1873 (n) to take office. He held that without experience in office he could not formulate his policy on such issues as the position in Central Asia, the new rules of international law arising out of the Alabama controversy, the treaty of commerce with France, and local taxation. Plainly, however, in this case it was simply a tactical advantage which produced this attitude, and under modern conditions the opposition is possessed of a body for regular consultation, and has expert advice in abundance. Lord Salisbury, no doubt, wanted Lord Rosebery in 1895 to dissolve but he found no difficulty in adopting a programme, and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman made no bones about doing likewise in 1905. No doubt a ministry, in these circumstances, may have to be more sketchy in its proposals, but that means little.

(n) 214 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 1931 ff. See p. 306, ante.

An opposition naturally will state its proposals in bold outline, as Mr. Gladstone insisted in 1885 when asked by Mr. Parnell to state fully his views on Ireland; but later, of course, it can be expected to be more precise after its proposals have been long under consideration, as Mr. Chamberlain urged on Home Rule in 1892. On the other hand, the Liberals in 1905 justly declined the demand that they should formulate their policies on education, licensing and Chinese labour. A ministry is always well advised to stress its positive merits, as well as to produce a definite policy; the opposition may concentrate on criticism, but equally it should adduce something definite. What will become the real issue can never be safely predicted; but since the slump in European prosperity a strong line of unemployment is essential, as well as insistence on defence.

Mention has already been made of the influence of the party organisations in inducing the ministries to place items on their programmes. The response of ministers varies; the Conservatives have shown little readiness to accept dictation, but the Liberal party is less exclusive in its attitude. The Labour position is definitely much more affected by the party control. In other cases private organisations are effective; the Anti-Slavery Society and the Anti-Corn Law League played an honourable part in securing the emancipation of slaves by the Act of 1833, and the abolition of taxation of corn (o). In more recent times, with the multiplication of associations and the ever expanding activities of Government, influences are brought to bear on ministries and oppositions to promote or support legislation. The trade unions, the co-operative societies, the chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, the shipping interest, societies to promote free trade or tariff reform, the local authorities and their associations, municipal officials and civil servants, societies for the promotion of interests connected with art, music, films, theatres, public health, education, sanitation and other subjects (p) have access to members of Parliament and the Government, and can press their claims for attention. Thus the efforts of advocates of physical fitness bore fruit in the Physical Training and Recreation Act, 1937, but it must be remembered that their efforts might have failed but for the temptation offered to the ministry, to secure indirectly a higher standard of physical fitness in possible recruits for the defence forces. Legislation is often based on reports of Commissions, as in the case of cinematograph films in 1938, and administration, as well as legislation, may be suggested in like manner, as in the case of the changes in air administration, based on the report of the Cadman Committee on Civil Aviation. The ministries are also filled with eager experts, in close touch with the outer world, from whose teeming brains and ripe experience come forth large numbers of legislative projects, more than sufficient to occupy the whole time of ministries, apart from major legislation. The success of ministers depends largely on their skill to make the best use of the vast possibilities of legislative activity presented to them, and of oppositions on their capacity for taking up popular proposals and urging them on the electorate. It is significant that in 1937 the Labour party decided to pledge itself to the provision of a living rate of pension to workers retiring at age sixty-five, despite the enormous sums required to finance so ambitious a scheme. Such an issue obviously presents a fruitful source of advocacy of Labour and its denunciation, as seeking, by reckless promises of public funds, to win unfairly the favour of the electorate.

(o) For the failure of the Chartists, see Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 84 f., 92 f.

The attitude of individual ministers to projects not yet adopted by the ministry presents difficulties. In the earlier days there was more room for individual activity, and, while in 1865 (q) Lord Palmerston eschewed the issue of Parliamentary reform, Mr. Bright pressed the topic. Mr. Chamberlain caused much annoyance to the Queen, under Mr. Gladstone in 1880—85, and annoyed his leader by promulgating an unofficial programme (r), including payment of members, free education, and housing reform, while his faithful henchman, Mr. Jesse Collings, won immortality with his doctrine of “three acres and a cow.” Naturally these projects were aired at the election of 1885, though not adopted formally by the leader. Lord R. Churchill was not much less annoying to his venerable chief, for he urged land reform, improvements in local taxation, and the provision of allotments as counter-attractions, without troubling to secure his chief’s concurrence. But it was left for Mr. Chamberlain in the ministry of 1903 (s) to start the demand for tariff reform, and to make the question a definite issue in the election of 1906. If the decision went against the late ministry, the fact remains that of those elected a very large proportion (t) were definitely in favour of the tariff reform programme, as compared to those who followed the much less clear attitude of Mr. Balfour. This was comparatively innocuous since the party was in opposition, but it meant weakness, just as was the fate of the Liberal opposition in 1895, when the leaders would not even agree on a cause to make the central issue, for Lord Rosebery desired to grapple with the Lords, Sir W. Harcourt to stress local option, Mr. Morley clung to Home Rule, and others declared for the Newcastle programme of 1891, which after Home Rule had been held out by Mr. Gladstone to be his policy. The modern tendency is to make the appeal as wide as possible, and therefore to unite as many personal policies as possible in the general appeal. But it remains true that no minister must advocate any item which (q) Cf. Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 243, 260.

(p) Thus the Early Closing Association secured in 1928 the Shops (Hours of Closing) Act, 18 & 19 Geo. V. c. 33; Taylor, Brentford, pp. 275 ff. The case of the supporters of female suffrage is also conspicuous, and that of the Divorce Law Reform Union.

(r) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 173 f.

(s) Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, i. 338, 347 ff.

(t) Of 157 elected 102 were claimed as his supporters.

has not been approved by the Cabinet (u). Opposition leaders have inevitably a greater freedom, but they have to bear in mind that, if successful at the election, they will be confronted by demands for fulfilment of pledges, which may be gravely embarrassing. The rank and file of the party are entitled to expect their leaders to carry out policies announced by any of them, and under the modern system of a Shadow Cabinet policy should be agreed, and then announced in unanimity by the leaders.

The mode of announcement of policies (x) at dissolutions began historically with the royal speech at the close of the existing Parliament, which from the time of Queen Anne came to be recognised as the work of ministers, not a personal declaration by the Crown. The proclamation of William III.'s anti-French policy in 1701 had, however, few successors, for that of 1784 was of formal, rather than real, importance. That of 1831, however, intimated a definite appeal to the electors on a well-defined issue, reform of a defined kind. But Sir R. Peel's Tamworth manifesto of 1834 heralded a more direct approach to the electors, and the speech from the throne ceased to be used to any substantial extent for this purpose, though occasional exceptions are noted, as in 1886 and 1923. Sir R. Peel's innovation was repeated in 1847 by himself, while the Whigs took a published speech by Lord John Russell as their manifesto, and the protectionists accepted a manifesto letter to their leader's constituency. The practice was established by 1865, according to Mr. Disraeli's own account, when in the Lords he substituted for it, in 1880, a letter to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which served equally well. The more direct method of platform appeals, before an election, was due to Mr. Gladstone, who as early as 1857 had started the practice of pre-election oratory outside his own constituency. In 1879 his Midlothian

(u) Taylor, Brentford, pp. 279 ff., shows that Mr. Baldwin pledged himself to equal suffrage before the election of 1924, and that Mr. Churchill's effort to impose responsibility on Lord Brentford was wholly unfounded.

(x) Emden, The People and the Constitution, pp. 281 ff.

campaign, which, in effect, was an address to the whole body of electors (y), definitely inaugurated a new régime, to be followed in the shape of speeches outside his constituency in 1886 by action as Prime Minister in support of Home Rule. The Queen remonstrated at the innovation, which Mr. Disraeli had eschewed, but the Premier pointed out that Lords Salisbury and Iddesleigh had forced him to action by speaking frequently since 1880 outside their own constituencies (z). In 1892 Lord Salisbury innovated, by addressing a manifesto to the electors of the United Kingdom; this was followed by the coalition Government of Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Bonar Law in 1918, and, though Mr. Baldwin preferred an election address to his constituency in 1924, he resorted thereafter to the system of an address to the electors. It must be added that broadcasting has added a fresh mode of appeal, for the leaders of the parties are now permitted to make a direct application to the electorate in this way, though this cannot supersede the address.

6. The Cabinet and the Leaders in Opposition.

It is an essential feature of the British party system that the parties should be agreed on fundamentals, in special on the principle of majority rule under a democracy, and the reason of the degree of success attained in its operation lies simply in this consideration. In foreign countries, where the British model has been copied, it has worked only where a like guiding doctrine is accepted, as in Holland, Belgium and the Scandinavian States. Where the doctrine has received only lip service, the result is that the system does not work, as in the case of the troubled history of Spain, ending in the savage hostilities of 1936—39. Granted that Italian ambition and eagerness to obtain mastery over the Mediterranean explains, in part, the Spanish outbreak, the fact that General Franco and other Spaniards were prepared to be false to their oaths, to invite foreigners and enlist Moors to destroy their fellow countrymen, and to violate every principle of humanity, by bombing of undefended towns and the deliberate destruction of women and children, is eloquent proof that, where there is no true faith in democracy the system cannot work. Its success in the Dominions confirms the view that, for a true democracy, the system has excellent results, and so far there is promise in its operation in India. It is this realisation that Communism and the doctrine of revolution by violence are fatal to democracy that has induced the Labour party in Britain to decline to form a popular front with the Communists. So far as at any time they may do so, it must be admitted that they are striking a serious blow at democracy, and that the British system of government is really in danger.

(y) Speeches in Scotland, i. 211.
(z) Morley, iii. 344.

As matters stand, as both great parties, as well as the Liberals, still cling to democracy, there are definite limits which they must respect. The opposition seeks power to effect the changes it desires, but it does not seek power by means which deny democracy. There are standards of fair dealing which are normally respected, and which, if any party should violate, it endeavours to prove still in reality intact. It follows, therefore, that in many matters there must be co-operation, above all in arranging the business of the House. It is not the right of the Government to stifle criticism; it must therefore put down for discussion such financial items as the opposition wishes to discuss. It must find time for a discussion of a vote of censure. On the other hand, it expects reasonable aid from the opposition in dealing with normal non-contentious business, and in arranging the use of Parliamentary time. It is entitled to be free from meaningless obstruction intended simply to waste the session; when the Irish Nationalist party practised this amusement (a), it was because it denied that the principles of democracy allowed them to be forced to remain in a British Parliament, and by seeking to destroy its operation they hoped to show that they must be conceded Home Rule. A like attitude by an opposition party to-day would suggest its deliberate hostility to democracy, which implies essentially that the majority shall govern, and that the opposition shall criticise, but shall yield, so long as the majority remembers the fundamental fact that it is but a temporary mandate, of a more or less definite character, and that to exceed it is to deny democracy, just as much as if the opposition should set about to render government difficult by obstruction. Hence every occasion on which by brute violence, such as repeated disorder and noises, the Commons is prevented from functioning, marks the breakdown for the moment of democracy, and the offenders are so conscious of this that they always seek to justify their action by the allegation that the Government has itself broken the convention that it shall not misuse its power. But there are few more discreditable incidents than that of November 12th, 1912 (b), when the opposition shouted down speaker after speaker, and the Speaker, after fruitlessly adjourning the House for an hour, was compelled to terminate the sitting, which ended with Mr. Ronald McNeill's assault on Mr. Churchill. It is significant that on July 24th, 1911, a most important speech of Mr. Asquith on the Parliament Bill could not be delivered for incessant tumult, for which lasting discredit attaches to Lord Hugh Cecil and the late F. E. Smith (c). It is unfortunate that Conservatism should thus have set precedents for disgraceful rowdyism unworthy of thinking men.

(a) See Gladstone's account, Letters, 2 s., iii. 189—92, of the measures taken on February 3rd-4th, 1881, to introduce the closure and the suspension of Irish members en masse, and Redlich, Procedure of the House of Commons, pt. ii., chap. ii.

The measure of co-operation must vary with the occasion. It is closest in war or time of threat of war (d), and even then may be imperfect. It is true that in 1914—15 there was a measure of co-operation between opposition and the Government, that Mr. A. Chamberlain gave aid in finance, and that Mr. Balfour served on the Imperial Defence Committee. But that did not prevent their combining with Sir J. French to compel a coalition on the threat of attack, based on alleged shortage of munitions. On the other hand, the concurrence of the opposition leaders was necessary when so grave an undertaking was to be entered into, as the grant, as part of the spoils of war, of Constantinople to Russia, or the accord with Italy (e). The existence of such co-operation in matters of defence is always more or less in evidence. The Labour Government in 1929—31 invited certain forms of co-operation, and the Labour leaders in 1937—38 were careful not to attack the ministry on the ground that they were kept at arm's length on defence matters.

(b) Mr. A. Chamberlain's defence (Politics from Inside, pp. 491—4) is very discreditable to him.

(c) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 314—20.

(d) E.g., in the Agadir crisis in 1911, Chamberlain, op. cit., p. 347.

Co-operation is also sought when issues approach such a crisis that inaction seems dangerous to the public welfare. There are obvious cases in the repeal of the Test Act, 1828, and the more radical general relief to Roman Catholics of the following year, in the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846, and in the final franchise settlement of 1867. Mr. Gladstone thus secured his disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869, his Education Act in 1870, and his Ballot Act in 1872 (f). Years after, with the aid of the Queen also preferred in the Irish Church issue, he secured the Acts for the extension of the franchise and redistribution of seats, while it was by agreement between Government and opposition (g) that the Speaker took his famous decision to terminate the debate of January 31st—February 2nd, 1881, and that the subsequent steps to counter the obstruction of the Irish party were carried. But he failed to induce the opposition to share with him a solution in 1886 of the Irish question, a result most unhappy for Britain, for from it sprang the Constitution of Eire, in which the name of the Crown never occurs, and under which all British subjects in Eire are aliens, if they are not Irish nationals. In 1906 also, despite the King's goodwill (h), it proved impossible to secure agreement on the Education Bill, and not even a conference under royal auspices enabled accord to be reached on the Parliament Bill in 1910 (i), nor on the Government of Ireland Bill in 1914 (k). On the other hand the Liberal leader (l) refused co-operation in bringing pressure to bear on President Kruger to accept the British terms for a settlement of the demands of the Uitlanders for fairer treatment in the Transvaal. But both Liberals and Conservative leaders took part in consultations with the Labour Government in 1931 (m), and were apparently willing to afford it assistance if it would only consent to make such economies and to impose such taxation as would give a reasonable assurance of security for the stability of the finances of the country. In the end they agreed to a coalition or National Government, rather than seek mere party advantage by destroying the Labour ministry out and out. There is no reason to doubt their sincerity in seeking an accord, which would not have driven the Labour party into an embittered opposition.

(e) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 129; Beaverbrook, Politicians and the War, i. 51; Churchill, World Crisis, 1915, pp. 298 f.

(f) Morley, ii. 367 ff.; Letters, 2 s., ii. 223.

(g) Letters, 2 s., iii. 188 f.; Esher, Journals, i. 79 f.

More curious was the situation during the Palmerstonian régime from 1859—65. Lord Derby, though head of the late ministry, and therefore also of the opposition, had really no desire to succeed in ousting his rival, and accordingly virtually supported his retention of office, thus curbing radical elements in his party, disliked by both peers alike, but in this case the co-operation was not avowed to the younger Conservatives, lest dissatisfaction with the attitude of their leader should drive them into mutiny (n).

(h) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 458 ff.; so in 1908; ibid. 658 f.; Bell, Rendall Davidson, i. 726 ff.

(i) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 285 ff. (k) Spender, op. cit. ii. 53 ff.

(l) Spender, Campbell-Bannerman, i. 233 ff.

(m) Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 344 ff.

(n) Cf. Guedalla, Gladstone and Palmerston, p. 150; Bell, Palmerston, ii. 260, 280 f., 340 f.

Co-operation is greatly facilitated by the maintenance in opposition of cohesion among members of the late Government. The Shadow Cabinet normally (o) contains the members of the late administration, if they remain loyal to their late chief, but it may be supplemented by other members of promise. We know a good deal of the difficulties of the working of such bodies from Mr. A. Chamberlain's references to the Unionist position in the years from 1906 (p), and Mr. Asquith finally parted company with Mr. Lloyd George through disagreement on the latter's abstention from attendance at the Liberal Shadow Cabinet (q) on the occasion of the discussion of the party's attitude towards the General Strike of 1926. The attitude of the leader of the party to the Government is strikingly illustrated by the overtures made by Mr. Lloyd George (r) in October, 1910, to Mr. Balfour, with a view to the formation of a coalition ministry, which would solve the Irish question on federal lines, study impartially tariff reform, give colonial preferences, and arrange national training. Mr. Balfour's rejection of the plan seems to have been based on the advice of Mr. Akers-Douglas, Chief Whip under Lord Salisbury and Home Secretary under Mr. Balfour, as regards the feeling of the party and his own determination not to become another Robert Peel, who "twice committed what seems to me the unforgivable sin. He gave away a principle on which he had come into power—and, mind you, neither time had an unforeseen factor come into the case" (s). It is clear that the negotiations were from the first known to Mr. Asquith, that later the Cabinet was informed, and that the various Unionist leaders were (o) Lord Brentford was not, it seems, included in the Conservative Shadow Cabinet; Taylor, p. 290.

(p) Politics from Inside (1936), e.g., on Mr. Balfour's Albert Hall pledge (1910) of a referendum on the budget (pp. 306 ff); Lord Milner's position (pp. 368–70).

(q) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 358–71.

(r) War Memoirs, i. 32 ff.; Dugdale, Balfour, ii. 72–80; Spender, op. cit. i. 287 f.; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 191–3, 283–94.

(s) Dugdale, ii. 75. Mr. J. Chamberlain was no less censorious of Peel before his own action in 1886.

initiated into them in various ways. Mr. Chamberlain shows also that the final decision to break off negotiations with the Government on the settlement of the relations of the two Houses in 1910 was taken at a meeting of some twenty leaders of the party meeting at Lansdowne House (t). There were further soundings as to co-operation in 1913 (u) and 1914, and it is easy to see how simple relations of this informal kind are, and how both parties, even in these times of very violent opposition, were brought close to each other by considerations of common interest in securing national defence and preparedness.

The formal work of co-operation in getting business arranged falls, of course, on the Government Whips on the one hand and those of the opposition on the other; the latter, of course, are appointed by the leader, as are those of the Government by the Premier.

The essential position of the opposition, as part of the mechanism of the State, is marked by the fact that the settlement in 1937 of salaries of ministers was accompanied by the grant of a salary of £2,000 a year to the leader of the opposition, that is the larger opposition party, if there is more than one. The Speaker decides any question as to the proper recipient of the sum, which is charged on the Consolidated Fund, and is not therefore open to challenge, as are ministers' salaries.

It is worth noting that Mr. Balfour, on formally resigning the party leadership in November, 1911, was careful to intimate the fact to the King, so that he might not learn of his retirement from the Press (x). It is not known whether this practice has always been followed, but clearly with the grant of a salary the action would be proper.

(t) Chamberlain, op. cit., p. 296.

(u) Chamberlain, op. cit., pp. 576 f. (W. Churchill). For Churchill's anxiety to effect an early coalition, cf. in 1915, World Crisis, 1915, pp. 198 f. Mr. Asquith always doubted the value of coalitions; Spender, i. 287.

(x) Dugdale, Balfour, i. 89 f. For Gladstone's action in 1875, see Guedalla, i. 453.

7. The Cabinet and the House of Lords.

The relations of the Cabinet and the House of Lords have consistently presented difficulties, which, modified by the Parliament Act, 1911, are yet very imperfectly solved. That the Lords could control a Government by refusing assent to measures which it deemed so vital that it was prepared to ask the Crown to swamp the Upper House was denied emphatically by Earl Grey (y) in the great dispute over the Reform Bill of 1832, and when in 1910—11 the issue became critical through a conflict between the Commons, resolute and backed by the majority of the electorate, the Lords only claimed the right, not to thwart the will of the people, but to ensure that in fact the people had declared its will in the sense asserted. In the early days of the new system the Lords' views were regarded with considerable respect; thus in 1839 the demand by that House for a Select Committee on Ireland, though within its powers, elicited from the ministry a demand from the Commons of a vote of confidence. Sir R. Peel demurred on the ground, in itself quite plausible, that the proper attitude to be adopted was to judge of the attitude of the Lords by their treatment of the legislation submitted to them, and not by abstract declarations. Even in 1850 the disapproval by the Lords (z) of the action of the ministry in regard to the exaggerated claims of Don Pacifico on the government of Greece was countered by a demand for a vote of confidence in the Commons (a). This, however, reflects an older attitude, one quite incompatible with the sovereignty of the electorate as established in germ in 1832, decisively by the extension of the franchise from 1867 to 1928.

Despite the terms of the Parliament Act, 1911, the power of the Upper Chamber to hold up legislation for a minimum period of two years remains a very definite check on the power of a Labour or Liberal Cabinet, and gives the Lords the power of securing effectively that no measure shall be passed finally without ample opportunity of consideration. Moreover, the period mentioned secures that the ministry, which has any drastic measures to pass, must put them forward while fresh in office, and thus in enjoyment of a recent mandate. It would be impossible for a Government to bring forward in the latter period of its tenure of office any legislation of a vehemently controversial type, even if it grew immediately out of a position which had only emerged during the progress of events in that Parliament. It remains, therefore, open to the House of Lords to insist that nothing shall be brought before it without a clear mandate, unless it is adduced early in the life of the Commons. Moreover, the power of delay may doubtless be used against almost any measure, even if it has figured at the last election as a major issue, for the character of general elections admittedly renders it almost impossible to hold that a clear mandate has been given for any one item. It is clear, therefore, that, however energetically a Labour opposition may strive at an election to secure a mandate, which the Lords should accept as requiring the immediate passing of legislation, it will always be open to the Lords to contend that they are not satisfied that there is any such mandate.

(y) See Esher, Influence of King Edward, pp. 82 ff.

(z) June 17th: 111 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 1292 ff.

(a) The Prime Minister adduced precedent for staying in office, 112 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 102—6.

This position would doubtless be open to comparatively little objection if the Upper Chamber were impartially constituted, but it is idle to suppose that any measure sent up by a Conservative majority in the Commons would be denied acceptance, even if details might be modified, normally in the direction of greater Conservatism, by the Lords. It is this essential consideration that renders it impossible to accept the Lords as a satisfactory Second Chamber. The functions of such a body, as defined by the Bryce Committee (b), presume that the Upper House is a body free from the acute partisanship which marks the existing House. Its functions should be (1) to revise the legislation sent up from the Commons, a task regularly neglected by the Upper Chamber, including the law lords, who seem to see nothing insistent in their sharp criticism of the drafting of Acts, though they seldom make any attempt as legislators to put them in shape; yet if this is not a proper function for them to perform, there is no justification whatever for their sitting in the Lords, since judges are excluded deliberately with universal assent from the Commons. (2) Minor Bills should be more freely introduced in the Upper House, where there is time for full examination, impossible in the Lower House. (3) The House should have the power of delay of any measure, in so far as might be just adequate to enable the opinion of the nation to be adequately expressed upon it, e.g., constitutional changes, fundamental innovations, or issues on which opinion was evenly divided. (4) Full and free discussion in a House, whose views do not determine the fate of the Government, on large and important questions, such as those of foreign affairs. Such discussions have often in the past been of considerable interest, but with the growing importance of the Commons such issues must be discussed there first, leaving them later to be debated in the Lords, as in the case of the presentation of Mr. N. Chamberlain's foreign policy on March 24th, 1938, action in the Lords following on March 29th in a relatively uninspired atmosphere.

(b) Parl. Pap. Cd. 9038. See also G. B. Roberts, Functions of an English Second Chamber (1926).

To deal with such issues it is clear that a hereditary House cannot be suitable. The Chamber must be open to all classes, must represent the will of the people, not of a certain class, must not contain a perpetual preponderance of one party, and should permit of the membership of men of ripe mind and mature experience, whose presence in the Commons would be hard to obtain owing to the exigencies of electioneering. The Bryce Report suggested election of 246 members by panels of the Commons in thirteen districts by proportional representation, and of eighty-one from the hereditary peers in the first instance by a joint standing committee of the two Houses; later non-peers might be elected, but a minimum of thirty peers was essential; the law lords, and princes of the blood royal if peers. Tenure was to be for twelve years, with quadrennial retirement of a third. The decision of what were money bills was to be transferred from the Speaker to a committee of seven members of each House, elected for the duration of each Parliament, while for deadlocks on other Bills an elaborate procedure by conference was adumbrated. The scheme was still-born, and its determination to maintain a hereditary element unacceptable to all democrats (c).

The coalition attempt in 1922 to deal with the issue was half-hearted and abortive (d), and Lord Birkenhead in 1925 and Lord Cave (e) in 1927 adumbrated proposals. The proposal of 1922 suggested part election of hereditary peers by peers, other members elected from outside, and some nominated by the Crown. In 1928 Lord Clarendon suggested 150 peers elected by peers, 150 nominated in proportion to the strength of parties, and a limited number added by the Crown, in the latter case for each Parliament only. In 1932 the Unionists interested suggested 150 elected by the peers, 150 by local authorities, and in 1935 Lord Rockley urged the creation of life peerages as a mode of strengthening the Chamber, while Lord Rankeillour sought wider powers for it. In 1937 Mr. Williams suggested that differences between the Houses might be settled by votes of members of the local authorities. All these devices are merely intended to secure power for the Upper Chamber against democracy, and the Labour party has naturally come to the conclusion that a Second Chamber is merely mischievous. If a Chamber must be preserved, it should be confined purely to revising purposes,

(c) Cf. Lees-Smith, Second Chambers, pp. 216—35.

(d) See 51 H. L. Deb. 5 s., 524—72, 642—82, 783—815, 963—96; 52 ibid. 261—88.

(e) He desired exclusion of constitutional issues affecting the Crown or the Lords, and reference of the point as to money bills to a joint standing committee. Hereditary peers were to select a number for twelve years, and some were to be nominated. See Mallet, Cave, pp. 301 ff.

and should only have power to delay a Bill for a single session, or for such time as is ruled necessary by the Speaker for adequate discussion (f). To give such powers only would rule out election by the people or by local authorities, and would suggest selection by the Commons by proportional representation. It is easy to doubt if such a body would have serious merits, and in Queensland no Second Chamber has existed since 1922, nor has its restoration secured any substantial popular feeling, while in Canada one province only, the Conservative Quebec, has a Second Chamber. But it must be pointed out that the work of these Legislatures in federations is not comparable in importance with that of the British Second Chamber.

Should, however, the Second Chamber be abolished, there would be need for some safeguard against misuse of the power of the Cabinet. It might be possible to take a hint from Norway and provide that constitutional changes must be introduced into the first session of one Parliament and become law only if passed by the next Parliament after a general election (g). It would also be possible to shorten the duration of Parliament to three years, as in the Australian Commonwealth and New Zealand, though that time would be rather inconveniently short. In either case the difficulty would arise of the limitation of the powers of Parliament by its own action, the possibility of which Bacon (h) denied energetically, for that which is sovereign cannot limit its sovereignty. It might be necessary to invoke the intervention of the Crown to safeguard the constitution (i).

(f) Cf. Lees-Smith, Second Chambers, pp. 247—49.

(g) A two-thirds majority might be required as in Norway (Art. 112).

(h) Cf. Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), p. 14. In the Union of South Africa the Parliament now has unlimited power; Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—7, pp. 11, 72.

(i) It must be noted that Evatt, The King and his Dominion Governors, while assenting the need of safeguards, has no concrete suggestions of value; cf. Keith, Current Imperial and International Problems, 1935—6, pp. 81 ff.

8. The Limitation of Cabinet Authority.

The system of British government is doubtless open to attack on many grounds. The most important, doubtless, is that revealed very clearly in 1938, when the ministry was found using an authority, derived in 1935 in large measure from its professions of fidelity to the League, for the purpose of departing wholly from the principles of the League and negotiating under an ultimatum with Italy. Yet that power had successfully violated the League Covenant in Ethiopia, and was devoting its efforts to bringing Spain under its protectorate as one step in its policy of establishing Italian hegemony in the Mediterranean, and replacing Britain in control of Egypt and the Suez Canal. It follows, of course, from this Conservative precedent that a Labour Government can feel fully entitled boldly to ignore, if in power, any limitation imposed upon it by the terms of its election promises. Whether the danger of serious detriment to British welfare from this source is grave must remain in doubt. The extreme severity of the language used in April regarding Mr. N. Chamberlain's attitude by Mr. Attlee and Sir S. Cripps cannot be taken as insincere, for the character of both men precludes any such treatment of their protests and warnings. Yet it may be held that a policy earnestly advocated by the Prime Minister and Lord Halifax must not be wholly inconsistent with the professions on which they achieved power. The difficulty, however, certainly presents itself that the request for a reference to the people was not accorded when asked for, and, though it is easy to say that the whole country, except the National Council of Labour, appears to approve the Governmental position, the exception is grave, for it represents a vast mass of organised and sincere opinion.

A further serious ground of criticism is the fact that the enormous power of the Cabinet may be founded on the support of a small majority only of those electors who have polled their votes at a general election, and the objection to this position is enhanced if the election is of distant date. There is in theory a very great danger in the misuse of power by a ministry with a distant mandate; that it has been avoided in the past may be assigned to the essential moderation, which is the chief political asset of the British people. But whether that moderation will endure is uncertain, and it is legitimate to consider how often the apparent authority of the ministry, as reflected in the number of seats it claims in the Commons, differs from the actual authority as represented by the votes of the electors. Such calculations, of course, offer difficulties as regards exactness, but the general facts are really beyond serious doubt.

It seems that in 1900 the majority of 134 won by the war election would more justly have been sixteen, in which event the education and licensing legislation of Mr. Balfour would never have been passed, and the unhappy blunder of Chinese labour in South Africa might have been avoided. The colossal Liberal majority of 1906, 336 (k), was unwieldy and the more normal figure of ninety would have given a better Commons, and have avoided the crudities of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906. The election of 1918 gave 478 seats to the coalition Government out of the new total of 707, but the votes in the 600 contested seats were 5,180,257 for the ministry, 5,608,430 for non-coalition candidates, and the most optimistic view could only suggest a total Governmental vote of 7,346,286 to 6,527,289. In 1922 the total of seats fell to 615, with the elimination of those of the Irish Free State, and the Conservatives with 5,500,382 votes secured 344 (347) seats, the National Liberals, with 1,673,240, 53 seats, the Liberals, with 2,516,287, 61 seats, Labour, with 4,241,383, 142 seats; a Conservative member thus represented 17,900 votes, a National Liberal member 29,100, a Labour member 30,800, and a Liberal no less than 46,200 votes. In 1923, while there was little addition to the total vote, the results were amazingly dissimilar; the Conservatives with 5,538,824 votes received 258 seats, the Liberals with 4,311,147 secured 159, Labour with 4,438,508 had 191, thus incidentally definitely establishing itself in the position of the second party in the State. If the Protection proposals of Mr. Baldwin thus received a definite set-back, the capital levy of Labour was even more decisively rejected. In 1924, on the other hand, the Conservatives with 7,854,523 votes secured 412 (415) seats (l), the Liberals, with 2,928,747, only forty (44), and Labour, with 5,489,077, 151. Thus the Government was in an actual minority of votes as against the two opposition parties, and while a Conservative represented 19,000 votes, a Labour man 36,000, a Liberal stood for 73,000. In 1929 the results were no more satisfactory as a representation of the electorate, for the Conservatives secured 260 seats with 8,658,910 votes, the Liberals 58 (59) with 5,305,123, and Labour 289 (287) with 8,384,461. In 1931 the results, of course, were hopelessly desperate, as was inevitable in an election fought under the strain of severe reaction against the apparent danger to national security in finance, and the majority for the National Government on any reckoning must have been enormous. But on proportional voting the figures would have been less impressive; in lieu of 473 members the Conservatives would have had 270, in lieu of 68 Liberals 110, and in lieu of 13 National Labour would have claimed 50, and the composition of the Commons would thus have differed vitally from that actually achieved. In 1935 there was a slight return to normality, the Government secured Conservatives 387, Liberal Nationals 33, National Labour 8, with three Nationals sans phrase, a total of 431, while Labour had 154, Liberals 21, the Independent Labour party four, and there were four Independents and a Communist. The contested seats gave the Government 405 seats for some 11,789,575 votes, Labour 141 for 8,325,446, and Liberals 21 for 1,443,112. Thus the members represented roughly 29,000, 59,000, and 69,000 votes. In the southern counties of England with 79 seats some 836,573 Labour voters found themselves without a single representative, while 2,068,323 Conservatives were rewarded by 77 seats. Yet 760,000 voters in the London area obtained 22 seats, and Labour won 24 seats in the West Riding, with about the same number as in southern England (m). It is needless to multiply further details. The result of an election is much too capricious to be regarded with complete satisfaction. No doubt the present scheme is not the object of violent protest, but the reason is the unsatisfactory one that the party, which may reasonably look for power, feels convinced that in due course the turn of chance will give it a majority equally disproportionate to that of its rival, and that by constitutional usage it will be entitled to expect from the opposition respect for its authority without regard to the numerical proportions of voting. Yet there is always the risk that this state of affairs will not indefinitely endure, that a decision on foreign policy by a Government may elicit the resort to strike action by the workers to render it abortive, while financial interests, strengthened by the fact that a Labour Government represented no sufficient plurality of votes, might use their great power to destroy a Labour ministry, fortified by the feeling that the people had not really authorised the ministry to exercise power.

(k) Liberals, 377; Labour, 43; Irish, 83; Unionists, 167.

(l) Seven members elected as Constitutionalists adhered to Conservatives and Liberals.

(a) Proportional Representation.

Of the remedies for this state of affairs the most obvious is proportional representation. It is true that it has been used in a full form, but little in the British Empire, and that it is not possible to argue very satisfactorily from conditions in Holland, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland or elsewhere (n). But in Tasmania it is adopted and operated with general accord; in the Union of South Africa it has operated without difficulty for the election of Senators, in the Irish Free State it has greatly mitigated the bitterness of faction, and has probably operated essentially in the interests of peace, order and good government; in the Constitution of Eire it remains enshrined (n). In Northern Ireland its operation was not seriously open to exception, and its repeal was dictated by reasons which were purely based on political passion. The report of the Royal Commission in 1910 (o) was hostile, but not very convincing, and the Speaker's Conference in 1918 (p) pronounced in favour of the scheme in all multi-member constituencies to be created under the redistribution impending. The Lords were strongly in favour of the project, and a bitter controversy raged thereon with the Commons, which quite naturally could not see that it lay in the hands of the Lords to dictate to it such a theme (q). In the end the Representation of the People Act, 1918, made optional, if decided by Parliament later, an experiment with a hundred seats arranged in groups of from three to seven. There never was any chance of action being taken under the authority thus accorded, and all that was saved was proportional representation for the Universities in which it has played a very insignificant part. The Conservatives in the Commons were strongly hostile, and the official party attitude is against the change. Labour since 1918 had committed itself to the doctrine that minorities should be given their proportionate, and no more than their proportionate, representation, but the experience of the election of 1923 had convinced it that there was advantage to be gained from the existing system, and therefore it did not support a private Bill promoted for the Liberals, converted now to the idea, in 1924, and it was defeated by 238 to 144 votes. In

(m) J. H. Humphreys, The General Election, 1935, and Constitutional Reform (1936).

(n) P. R. Pamphlet No. 81, May, 1937.

(n) P. R. Pamphlet No. 81, May 1937.

(o) Parl. Pap. Cd. 5163. Cf. J. H. Humphreys, Proportional Representation; H. C. Morris, Parliamentary Franchise Reform in England from 1885 to 1918; F. Williams, The Reform of Electoral Representation.

(p) For Mr. Asquith's conversion, see Spender, ii. 297 f.

(q) Cf. Mallet, Cave, pp. 197—99. The Lords turned down the alternative vote.

the Parliament of 1929—31 the Liberals were anxious to secure the system of at least the minor boon of the preferential vote, and negotiations with the ministry were carried on, and it was hoped to secure by another Conference, between all parties, an accord on the principle of some change (r). In fact, however, of the selfish interests of the larger parties it was not to be expected that any real accord could be attained, and the prospect for proportional representation cannot be regarded as bright.

The arguments for the system are clear (s), and it is idle to ignore their force or even their existence. (1) Democracy is based on the prevailing influence of numbers; it is, therefore, logical that the electorate should be so represented as to present in the Commons the proportionate strength of parties. To prefer to this the haphazard results of the present system argues a certain disbelief in democracy, and a desire to curtail artificially its effective working. In fact, many people who do not really accept democracy approve the present mode of election because it is not democratic. (2) At present many voters are in the unfortunate position that they have only a choice of evils; they know that only a Conservative or a Labour man can succeed, that a Liberal or Independent is hopeless, and thus are compelled to vote for a man whose policy they distrust, if they are to have any chance of polling a useful vote. There is really no answer to this contention, the large proportion of unpolled votes at any election is due to many causes, but too little attention is given to the fact that in many cases voters abstain not from apathy or indifference, still less from acceptance of the Government, but simply because they have no candidate for whom they can vote with any pleasure. (3) It should be possible for voters to support a man of character and independent outlook, as contrasted with the average candidate bound slavishly to accept the policy of a political party, and though this would not be easy to arrange under proportional representation it would not be impossible, as it is virtually at present. (4) The system would probably diminish the undue importance which now attaches to the margin of unattached voters, who are easily swayed by emotion to one side or another. In single-member constituencies these voters certainly have a great strength, which might be diminished in the case of five- or seven-member constituencies.

(r) The result was negative, and the Bill was not passed before the fall of the ministry; Somervell, King George the Fifth, pp. 421 f., 424 f.

(s) They are underestimated by Finer, Modern Govt., ii. 920 ff., in the interests of the driving power for socialisation possible to a Government which is disproportionately strong.

The arguments against the system are in part clearly untenable. (1) That based on the difficulty of voting for the ignorant elector and from the number of spoiled votes is without serious importance, so long as voting for more than one candidate is not made essential. Moreover, experience shows that spoiled votes are few after the system is once put in operation (t). (2) It is argued that the system severs the possibility of close connection between member and constituents, and imposes on members impossible difficulties in canvassing. But, apart from the fact that the enormous extension of the electorate has made personal connection very slight, and that in fact constituencies welcome candidates chosen from outside in a rather striking manner, there is the obvious fact that in practice the members of one political party would agree to share among themselves the several areas of a multi-member constituency, giving one another help just as at present—in a compact city area with five members, like Edinburgh, the candidates for the several constituencies do. (3) It is contended that the system would increase the power of the political party organisation, which would have to undertake the work of arranging for the members who were to stand, and of instructing the electors how they should mark their papers, so as to secure the return of all, or of as many as possible of the candidates of the party. But it is not clear that this would in effect mean that candidates of independent character would be ruled out as liable by their very character to affect injuriously the voting for party candidates in general. It is competent to argue in the opposite sense, that, by allowing an independent-minded candidate to stand along with docile representatives, the chances of all would be improved. The arguments are purely guess work (u). (4) It is contended that the system would encourage the creation of numerous small parties, and the splitting up of the country into cliques, with resulting disadvantage to the coherent character of Governments. But the argument seems extremely far-fetched. If in any constituency there exists a sufficiently strong body of opinion on any subject to secure the return of a candidate, it is probable that there would be in many other constituencies a like tendency, and that the idea of a large number of small parties would never be realised in practice. There is not room really in British politics for more than three, or possibly four parties, and it is idle to consider objections resting on mere improbable hypotheses. (5) A fairer argument is based simply on the desire for a strong Government, with an exaggerated majority, as making for continuity and decision of rule. It is thought that, though logically it cannot be counted upon, it is not probable that the custom of single-member constituencies with a simple majority decision will result, as it might do, in producing weak ministries liable to be upset by any chance vote. If that became common, the question would be reconsidered; at present the situation suffices is probably a very general view. (6) The difficulty of working the system at by-elections is stressed and unquestionably is real, but it is quite unnecessary to take so minor a point seriously, just as it is a matter of indifference that any suitable scheme of multi-member constituencies must always leave a considerable margin of inaccuracy of representation. It is quite clear that the Irish scheme, as it now works, gives sufficiently accurate results for all human needs. (7) A further contention suggests that the control of the people on the policy and choice of Governments would diminish. There would be groups, which would assort and re-assort themselves without the necessity of a dissolution, for, as we have seen, the standing principles regarding dissolution could not survive under the new order of things. But the answer obviously is that it is quite impossible to say that this would really mean a genuine loss of control. As matters stand, a bare majority, or a minority of electors, may send into power a Government, which thereafter may depart widely from their wishes, and which in any case probably is wholly unacceptable to the supporters of the opposition. The more probable outcome of the system would be that ministries would endeavour to legislate and administer in manner less extreme than at present, and the country might gain greatly by continuity of a moderate policy in place of possible violent vacillations from one aspect to another, which are made tolerable only at present by reason of a sense of political moderation in the electorate.

(t) There is much discredit to Scots Universities for their carelessness in voting by post.

(u) In many constituencies, as it is, the local body is all powerful.

It must be added that in Ireland the result of the general election, held together with the referendum on the constitution in 1937, was a clear disappointment to Mr. de Valera, who on December 2nd was moved to state that, while he was a supporter of proportional representation, none the less if the system were to fail to give strong Governments he would be compelled to reconsider the position. It happened that the voting gave exactly equal numbers to the Government and the non-Government parties, a result which, though embarrassing to Mr. de Valera, was regarded by others as securing the country from any rash moves on the part of their leader (x). In a democratic country, it is fair to say, what is most valuable, is a Government which owes its strength and moral authority to the support of a maximum number of the electors, rather than one given power by accidents of distribution of votes. The necessity of redistribution in 1937 was, indeed, so patent, as a result of changes in the distribution of population, consequent on economic conditions, that the ministry readily admitted that redistribution should be undertaken. That will do something, but probably not very much, to improve the present position as regards numerical representation of the views of the electorate.

(x) In the June election, 1938, Mr. de Valera intimated his intention to repeal proportional representation if he did not secure a clear majority, but that was given.

Little likely, as it is, that proportional representation shall now be adopted, the case for the alternative vote favoured in 1930—31 by the Liberals in their negotiations with Labour on reform is far more dubious. It is not rare in Australia, but its operation is always far more capricious than that of proportional representation, the supporters of which accordingly have little sympathy for an inferior scheme. The second ballot is still less in favour; in New South Wales (y) it was hastily abandoned after trial, and will not easily be restored. As in France, the manœuvres of parties to secure support in the second ballots are most unedifying, and the results are seldom likely to prove in any way satisfactory to supporters of movements for better representation.

(b) The Referendum.

A very different proposal suggests the use of the referendum to decide contested issues. The question naturally arose in connection with the position of the House of Lords during the controversies of 1909—11. The claim of the Upper House to dictate a dissolution could not seriously be accepted by the Liberals, nor would it have been accepted by Conservatives if the Chamber had been of Liberal complexion. But the Unionists felt that they might meet the demand of the Liberals that the will of the Lower House must prevail in one Parliament by the offer of a referendum (z). Mr. A.

(y) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions (1928), i. 415. For its defects in France, cf. Finer, Modern Govt. ii. 913.

(z) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 249 ff.

Chamberlain was prepared to go so far as to make a tariff reform budget subject, when first proposed, to a referendum, but as no accord was reached, he desired to drop the matter (a), only to find that Mr. Balfour had pledged himself to this expedient, generally as a sop to free trade feeling (b). In 1912, however, it was found possible to rid the party of the pledge, though there was still uneasiness on the score of the food taxation, which was deemed necessary by the tariff reformers as part of their scheme of imperial preference (c). Mr. Balfour's apologia for the project is interesting; he urged its superiority to a general election, because at the latter issues must be mixed; only in 1831 had there been a single issue, a statement broadly sound, though 1868 can fairly be added, so dominant then was the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In 1900 there was, perhaps, no very clear issue, save the successful termination of the matters arising out of the alleged victory in South Africa, but in 1906 the voters were moved by education, preferential trade, and Chinese labour as leading features (d). In 1910 there were two definite issues, the merits of the budget and the constitutional powers of the Lords, for a certain number of voters disliked the complicated and muddled land taxation scheme, but disliked more the intrusion of the Lords in a spirit of selfish anxiety to protect wealth from bearing a fair share of the additional burdens imposed on the country in part by defence, in part by the social schemes promoted by Mr. Lloyd George. Lord Curzon (e) also defended the referendum on this ground of the possibility thereby of eliciting a definite affirmative or negative to a clearly formulated question.

A second advantage claimed for the referendum was that by isolation of issues due attention would be paid to those

(a) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 194 f.

(b) Ibid. pp. 302—7, 310 f.

(c) Ibid. pp. 432 ff.

(d) 21 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1752.

(e) 6 H. L. Deb. 5 s., 945. See also Spender, Campbell-Bannerman, ii. 351—5.

submitted, and a real opinion elicited. The classical instance of confusion cited in support of this theory is the famous election of 1892, which saw the Liberal party provided with the Newcastle programme. The electorate thus voted in such a way as to render it quite impossible to say whether it approved municipal reform, which no doubt attracted London voters; employers' liability, desired by artisans' parish councils, dear to agricultural labourers still without local self-government; the eight hours' Bill, approved by the miners; the disestablishment of the Church in Wales, long an object of Welsh endeavour; or Home Rule, Mr. Gladstone's own choice. Thirdly, it is claimed, the referendum eliminates faction, and enables the electorate to determine questions without the alien considerations of the personality of the opposing local candidates, or of the rival leaders. Fourthly, the verdict on the referendum leaves ministers unaffected, and permits them to continue their official work, without the grave interference involved by the necessity of campaigning at a general election.

On the other side there must be set serious considerations. In the first place the isolation of issues is specially difficult in practice, if not in theory. Mr. A. Chamberlain candidly recognised this difficulty (f), and it was stressed by Mr. Asquith (g), who pointed out that in fact when the referendum was on the parties would exercise their whole electioneering power, and the decision would really be given on a party vote. This view was shared from study of the working of the Swiss referendum by Mr. MacDonald (h), and there is the remarkable case of the attempt in 1929, in the Australian Commonwealth, to treat the general election then arranged as a referendum on the desirability of the federation vacating in the main the field of industrial arbitration in view of the interference of the decision of the Commonwealth Court of Conciliation and Arbitration with the working of industrial authorities, whether Courts or wages boards, in the States, and the solid disadvantages of double control. While both parties were agreed in theory on dealing only with this issue, it proved, in fact, that the election was fought very much on ordinary lines, with all the confusion due to extraneous personal and political considerations.

(f) Op. cit. p. 194.

(h) 21 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1770.

(g) 15 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 1174 ff.

A second objection, accepted as valid by the Bryce Conference on Second Chamber reform, is that it would not work in the case of a large area like the United Kingdom, for different parts of which special legislation might be requisite. The electors, that is to say, would be confronted with a request for a decision on an issue, which had little application to their special circumstances, and might give a negative reply, when the merits of the case demanded an affirmative or vice versa. This argument is valid so far as it goes, but not of first-class importance. Thirdly, the referendum might diminish, as held by Mr. Asquith, the importance of elections, and thus the latter would come to be no more than a verdict on past administration and on personalities, while important issues would fall to the referendum. In view, however, of the great importance of personalities in human psychology, this danger seems hypothetical. Fourthly, it is objected that the referendum would reduce the sense of responsibility of members of Parliament, and that they might pass legislation on the basis that there remained the control of the referendum, if they had acted unwisely. On the other hand it is contended by Lord Curzon, among others, from Swiss experience, that instead the fact that a referendum may be claimed on legislation, compels legislators to concentrate on the quality of their legislation, conscious that it will come under the scrutiny of the electorate, or at any rate may so do, and that the likeliness of such a contingency will be enhanced by careless drafting, or rash proposals of substance. Clearly, both results are possible, and it is out of the question to predict what in fact would be the result in Britain. Fifthly, would the referendum detract from the authority of Parliament ? Both Mr. Asquith and Mr. A. Chamberlain, experienced Parliamentarians, thought that it would, the former contemplating that it would degrade the Commons to the level of a talking club, and Lord Bryce's Conference held that it would tend to lower the authority and dignity of Parliament. More vaguely, but portentously, it is accused of tending to imperil the principle of representative government. Lastly, it is contended that the position of a ministry must suffer if a referendum should go against it, even though it is not directly affected. There is truth in that. The Commonwealth ministry of Mr. Fisher lost prestige and authority, when in 1910 its referenda were rejected, and in 1937 the loss of the referenda on control of aviation, in all aspects, and of marketing schemes, did somewhat weaken the position of the ministry of Mr. Lyons.

In the event of opinion turning more favourably to the referendum (i) the obvious mode of using it would be when the House of Lords, and say a third of the membership of the Commons, were agreed against any measure, whether of a constitutional or ordinary type. No doubt finance measures would have to be excluded in general; there is force in Mr. Morley's view that a budget cannot well be submitted, and Mr. A. Chamberlain, from a very different standpoint, evidently concurred. To restrict the proposal only to constitutional Bills seems unsound, and a more general application would be wise. It is worth noting that it has been ingeniously conjectured that, if proportional representation ever were adopted, the chance of the referendum being adopted might be increased. In fact there would be a considerable incentive in such a case to have a simple way of ascertaining the country's real mind, and with the party system, as altered by the system of proportional representation, it is quite possible that party feeling would affect the operation of the referendum in a markedly minor degree.

(i) For various criticisms and foreign experience, see Finer, Modern Govt., ii. 929 ff.

Foreign experience in working the referendum is afforded largely by Switzerland, both in the federation and the cantons, and by the States of the United States. In the British Dominions it is embodied as part of the apparatus for amending the Commonwealth constitution, and experience there has been such as to suggest that any far-reaching proposal is apt to fare badly at the hands of the electors. One fundamental change alone has taken place, the acceptance of the transfer to the Commonwealth of the State debts, which involved the grant of a further legislative power. This has had the unexpected result of enabling the Commonwealth to enforce payment of instalments of interest on debt by a recalcitrant State, involving so serious a breach of sovereignty, as to render further concessions of legislative power by the States suspect (k). For conscription in the Commonwealth the proposal failed in 1916 and 1917 alike (l). It has been used freely enough for decisions on limitation of the use of alcoholic liquors, and occasionally for other matters, but these referenda have simply taken place under special legislation, and the referendum to settle disputes between the Houses of Parliament exists only in New South Wales.

(c) Parliamentary Committees.

A recent proposal of ingenious type (m) stresses the possibility of rationalising the exercise of Cabinet power by the device of appointing Parliamentary committees to co-operate with the ministers. The committees would be attached to the important departments, and would be duly constituted with reference to the strength of parties in the Commons. Purely party committees are not suggested, for many reasons. They would result in a breach of continuity on a change of Government; their members would be under the thumb of the whips; there would be clear advantage in giving to the opposition a fair share in co-operation, especially since many subjects are not really party in character, e.g., betting, religious education, liquor licensing, electricity, and so on; and in any case opposition members of real capacity could often help. Such committees would be able to examine proposed legislation on the subjects dealt with by the department to which each was attached, they could consider suggestions for the amendment of legislation, and could watch general tendencies in the field with which they were concerned, and publish any results of their labours which they deemed expedient. Co-operation between parties would thus be effective in moulding legislation, and the procedure could be applied in the case of the exercise of the delegated legislative powers of departments to good effect. A permanent financial committee might serve to obtain information to examine carefully the audited accounts and the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General; to investigate the general principles of financial policy, the issue of the gold standard or any substitute therefor, the effect of taxation in its relation to individuals and the country in general, and the measures to be taken to prevent rings of industrialists levying undue profits from the country, for example, by recommending State production in lieu of reliance on private enterprise. Such a body would replace effectively the Public Accounts Committee and the Select Committee on Estimates, which annually examines some selected accounts, but which has no real driving power, and produces results of no great value. In Parliamentary business it would replace the Committees of Ways and Means and of Supply, whose work it would much more efficiently perform, and with its aid a division would be made each year between the matters to be put in a Taxation Bill and a Financial Administration Bill, which would thus be examined more efficiently and satisfactorily. A drafting committee would serve to revise this aspect of Bills.

(k) Keith, The Dominions as Sovereign States.

(l) Keith, War Government of the British Dominions pp. 88—93.

(m) Cf. W. I. Jennings, Parliamentary Reform (1934); Finer, Modern Govt., ii. 884—6.

This scheme has some claims to consideration, but it runs counter to the essential preference of all Governments for wide powers to be exercised by ministers, free from such control as a committee would accord. The objections urged, for instance by Mr. Lees-Smith (n), naturally stress the objections to the introduction in Britain of the demerits of the system of committee government in France, with the resulting lack of a strong Government. The answer, no doubt, is not wholly relevant. The French system rests on a variety of factors, which have no British parallel, the absence in binding practice of a dissolution, the power of the Senate, the lack of any rule that appropriations and taxation must emanate from the Government, and so on. But the fact that the proposal is likely to diminish the autocracy of ministers is unquestionably a grave obstacle to its acceptance in a country where ministerial office is the legitimate object of the ambition of every normal member of the Commons. On the other hand it is easy to point out that much of the work of the Government is badly done, and that a committee system might easily avail to improve it, as in the case of such issues as town and country planning, unemployment, and the means test, agricultural marketing schemes, and so forth. Nor can it be denied that it is not sound that a Government should, like that of 1929—31, drift so far away from any real contact with the rank and file of the party. The failure of ministers to keep the party in 1931 in touch with the development of difficulties in the financial and economic conditions of the country cannot be ignored nor condoned. In like manner the failure of ministers in 1934—35 to make clear to their followers the emergence of grave dangers through British disarmament must be admitted to have been the source of serious loss to Britain, and much tragedy and suffering, past, present and future, in Europe and Asia. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the cult of a strong Government has been greatly furthered in (n) Manchester Guardian, March 25th, 1934. Queen Victoria feared the tendency of the Commons to invade the sphere of the executive, but on the issue of the recall of Sir B. Frere, Mr. Gladstone showed that this was no innovation; Morley, iii. 6 f., 23 ff.

Britain by the spectacle of the achievements of President Roosevelt, Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini, and by the fears of those capitalists, who on one score or another favour the adaptation to Britain of fascist doctrines, and think that this might be possible under stress of intensive war preparations.

(d) Devolution: Regional or Functional.

From another point of view relief might be obtained from Cabinet domination, by handing over to other authorities a substantial area of work, thus leaving ministers with the time necessary to justify their legislation and administration to the Commons, in lieu of merely enforcing their decisions by party control. Unfortunately the difficulties of effective action in this regard appear on examination more and more serious. The idea of devolution to local authorities was alive when the Local Government Act of 1888 was framed; matters might be handed over to the new authorities popularly elected, and the Commons might be spared the necessity of investigation of administration and discussions on certain aspects of finance. The grave difficulty which arises is that the whole trend of economic and social conditions is towards an ever increasing integration of the country. Large scale production tends to replace local industries, communications have become so rapid and easy that the existence of local feeling is affected, and the Governmental devotion to great schemes of social benefit render the parcelling out of control very difficult.

It is natural, therefore, that the most recent advocates of devolution admit that the country units of local government are not a sound basis for such action, and should instead suggest (o) that large, more or less, homogeneous units should be created, such as London, the South-East, Wessex, Wales, Cumberland, Westmorland, Lancashire, Cheshire, Northumberland, Durham, York, East Anglia, and Mercia. To them could be assigned agriculture and fisheries, public health, housing, education, local government, order, police, prisons, and their various policies might be subject to control of their legislation by the Home Office, or by the Houses of Parliament, or the Upper Chamber, if reconstituted on the basis of election by the provincial legislatures. The Commons would thus be relieved, centralisation diminished, new life introduced into localities, and the rather chaotic conditions of local government under the existing country boundaries would be remedied. The obvious difficulty of the scheme is its lack of any clear-cut scheme of finance. But the further objection must be made that agriculture and fisheries cannot be severed from tariff policy, protection, bounties and subsidies, that unemployment insurance and national health insurance cannot conveniently be divided from public assistance; housing depends largely on trade policy and distribution of population thence affected. It is difficult to contemplate the division of control of education, and there would have to be central action to provide for the position of children on transfer from one region to another, and so forth. Even more serious is the objection that the necessary local patriotism to secure a local activity is lacking.

(o) Ramsay Muir, How Britain is governed.

The position is different with regard to Scotland. There the law and judicial institutions already differ, and there is a tradition of a separate Parliament, which is still potent. Moreover, the steady decline of Scots prosperity and population already apparent is increasing with the systematic transfer to the south, especially to the London area, of the control of Scots undertakings. The railways are now merged in concerns vitally English, shipping, banking, many industries and broadcasting are under a more or less complete English control, and the English Press magnates have invaded the Scots sphere with resulting deterioration of the Scots character. Moreover, under the present regime, the social and religious unity of Scotland is being undermined by the steady influx of Irish Roman Catholics hostile to Scots ideals.

Further, the Speaker's Conference on Devolution favoured the possibility of some concession, and sources of revenue have been considered, such as licences, taxation of land values, entertainment taxation, inhabited house duties, and a share in income tax. The existence of a Scottish National party is noteworthy, and the necessity of some concession has been seen in the steady removal to Edinburgh of large sections of departments hitherto housed in London, with the result of much delay and expense in communications through delegations, which now can conveniently be interviewed by the Secretary of State in Edinburgh. It has also been proposed that Scots estimates should be studied in detail by the Scottish Committee of the Commons, which includes all members for Scottish constituencies, reinforced by from ten to fifteen others, and considers all Scottish Bills. Such a change, however, has little chance of acceptance in the present state of feeling in England, and support for Scottish self-government is hampered among the wealthier classes by fear lest power should fall into the hands of advanced Socialists, such as are prominent in the west of Scotland, where they enjoy full support from the immigrant and settled Irish community.

The movement in Scotland, however, suffers also from a wide divergence in view as to the proper objectives between the supporters of some form of Home Rule. Thus a section of opinion is eager to secure Dominion status on the model of the Irish Free State, under the monarchic constitution before the extrusion of the sovereign from any authority. Stress is laid by the supporters of this point of view on the advantage of having representation on the League of Nations, and developing interest in foreign policies, acting as a force making for peace. Other views would accept the great objections to erecting a tariff barrier between the two countries, and would therefore adopt the principle that on tariff questions there should be a common policy to be arrived at through arrangements with England, and in like manner foreign affairs might be dealt with by agreement, provided that the distinct character of Scotland received due recognition. The great difficulties of devising any working scheme are not ignored, but it is thought that they are not insuperable if the problem is approached with good will on both sides.

The Labour point of view is affected by the fact that the great trade unions are very reluctant to allow of anything which might hamper the maintenance of unity as between English and Scottish workers, and, though some sympathy with Home Rule aspirations is regularly expressed, it is not probable that the party would bring forward any serious policy in this regard. It is significant that Labour members voted strongly among the majority which defeated in 1938 the Caledonian Power Bill, which aimed at the development of electric power in Inverness-shire, with a view to the establishment there of a calcium carbide factory. This was, no doubt, due to the desire to secure the concentration of this new industry in Wales. The fact that a great majority of Scots members pressed for the Bill, and that the opposition was mainly that of the town of Inverness and of powerful landowners, who believed that the introduction of industry would diminish the value of their shooting and fishing rights, indicates that the position is not wholly satisfactory.

Those who favour a limited form of self-government (p) would assign to the Scots Legislature and government the maintenance of order, police, prisons and judicature; ecclesiastical affairs; agriculture and land; education; public health and local government generally; control of trades and professions, and of industrial and commercial undertakings. Like treatment might be given to Wales, which has a special bond of nationality in its language.

Even in this limited form the opposition to devolution is strong (q). It is insisted that, even with such large areas as Scotland or Wales, there are objections to having distinct systems of education, public health, control of transport or labour questions. Moreover, the central control of international relations, trade and customs would interfere with local autonomy, even in matters assigned to the units, as in Australia and Canada, hours of labour cannot be regulated by the federation, and joint action is difficult. The question of finance, it is added, is still without serious solution. England already pays more than its fair share of expenditure, and cannot be expected to continue to do so unless there is unity; it is admitted that Northern Ireland is specially favoured, but there are special reasons for differential treatment in that case. The effort to assign powers would result in increased legalism and references to the Courts, though that could be diminished if the powers of the Imperial Parliament remained unaltered, in scope, as is the case with regard to Northern Ireland, so that the doctrine of ultra vires would apply only to local legislation. In Northern Ireland it has been little invoked. Granted the maintenance of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament there would be no real risk in the abuse of power by the local legislatures, for that could be swiftly countered by Imperial legislation.

(p) Parl. Pap. Cd. 692.

(q) Cf. Finer, Modern Govt., ii. 880—2.

It is objected also that there would be extra cost in having elections and a Parliament. The scheme recommended by the Speaker (r) suggested that the members elected for the areas should form a Council of Commons, as well as sit in the Imperial Parliament, while a Council of Peers would be added; but this would be inconvenient, and add too much to the duties of members, and a distinct single-chambered Legislature would be demanded by most supporters of devolution. But it is plain that neither in Scotland nor Wales is there sufficient driving power to force the issue into practical politics for the present. The application of any such system to England, contemporaneously with Scotland and Wales, is still less in demand; devolution, however, restricted to Scotland and Wales would mean little decrease of the work of Parliament, and if accepted would rest on other grounds than the saving of work for Parliament in order that it might more effectively control the ministry.

(r) His scheme and that of Mr. Murray Macdonald are set out in Cmd. 692.

Functional devolution would relieve Parliament by aiding it in the performance of its tasks. The classical exposition of a full scheme is that of the Webbs (s), who suggest the creation of two Parliaments, one charged with foreign affairs, imperial relations, justice and police, the other with the whole field of economics and social services. Both would be popularly elected, but could be differently constituted as regards constituencies, franchise, period of office, time of session, &c. Combined action of both would set up a constitution, which would be enforced by the Courts. The financial legislation would fall to the economic legislature, but the political estimates approved by the other would have to be accepted by it en bloc, with decision by a joint session if a deadlock arose. No doubt this duplication would prima facie be objectionable, but the authors contend that single chamber government is not fair, either to ministers or members, and that the idea of one Parliament to express a single general will is a chimera. It must be admitted that the Labour party has displayed no enthusiasm for the plan, which is generally regarded as open to the fatal objection of destroying unity of action and planning.

Other schemes are based no doubt on the German Federal Economic Council (t), as it worked under the Weimar Constitution in the days when Germany had constitutional government, and some slight approach to democracy. In Britain in 1919, a National Industrial Conference was held, and in 1928 the Conference on Industrial Relations, favoured by Lord Melchett and others, suggested some endeavour to secure co-operative planning by employers and employed. The idea took a concrete shape in 1933, when it was suggested that a body might be set up composed of forty members of the Commons, twenty peers, 100 representatives of capital, 100 representatives of trade unions, and forty experts, nominated by the Government, which would have referred to it for consideration all Bills involving economic issues, discuss economic questions fully with expert knowledge, and examine the possibility of extending conciliation in the regulation of relations between employers and employed. It is clear that this project took due account of the desirability of having a really representative body, and of permitting full discussion of financial and economic questions, for which Parliament has no time, and many members thereof insufficient appreciation or understanding. The Economic Advisory Council naturally fills none of these purposes, for its membership is restricted, and its deliberations private and without public criticism. But it remains doubtful whether it is possible to construct any satisfactory body. There must be great difficulty in selecting a really representative body, and still more in having one in which the interests of consumers would be fully borne in mind. The experts, if impartial, would hardly be popular with any side, and, if there were any effort to make the body fully representative, it would have to be made unduly large. Hence, though Mr. Churchill (u) has toyed with the idea in an academic way, the chance of action being taken seems small. Yet the whole of the proceedings on such a measure as the Coal Mines Bill in 1938, or the Cinematograph Films Bill, suggests that the grave issues concerned would have been the better considered if they had been submitted to full examination by a body more competent to go into the vital details than was the House of Commons.

(s) A Constitution for the Socialist Commonwealth of Great Britain (1920); 4 New Reform Bill (Fabian Tract No. 236).

(t) Finer, Modern Govt., ii. 888—901.

(u) Parliamentary Government and the Economic Problem (Romanes Lecture, 1930).

CHAPTER VIII.

THE CABINET AND THE CROWN.

1. The Evolution of the Position of the Crown.(a) The Growth of Cabinet Responsibility.

It was the inevitable result of the Reform Act of 1832 that it rendered obsolete the old conception of the sovereign as essentially concerned with the fate of his ministry, and made the duties of the occupant of the throne those of an impartial head of the State, bound to conduct himself towards any ministry in such a manner that, while he should give it the fullest support, he should not be precluded by any attitude of his from rendering exactly the same services to a subsequent ministry, should the will of the electorate so decree. This was, of course, a novel idea. George III. (a) had pursued a personal policy, and even after he had sacrificed the American colonies he was ready to dismiss Fox and Lord North in 1783, and to replace them by W. Pitt. In 1807 he had driven the Grenville ministry from office. Under the Regency and George IV. it was admitted that the monarch could determine the complexion of the ministry according to his favour, and the disappointment of the Whigs at his failure to give them power was very great. It was a signal achievement when he was compelled to yield on Catholic emancipation after a most undignified struggle, and no doubt this marks the beginning of the end of the power of the sovereign (b). William IV was reluctantly compelled to realise the strength of ministers but his success in getting rid of Lord Melbourne, on the strength of a half-hearted offer to resign, shows how strong the sovereign still was. When not even his favour could induce the electorate to give Sir R. Peel a majority, his hostility to the Whigs was so well known that Queen Victoria's accession was regarded as invaluable (c), since it would help them against the Tories, while she in turn would gain from the fact that they would serve faithfully the only member of the royal family, save the Duke of Sussex, who would wish to have them in office. The Queen was generous in manifestation of her regard for Lord Melbourne (d); her refusal to meet Sir R. Peel's views regarding the ladies of the bed chamber, though it had the approval of the retiring Cabinet (e), was, as she recognised in later life, inconsistent with her constitutional position. It was in entire harmony with this view that she regarded the grant of a dissolution as essentially an appeal to the electorate to strengthen her ministry, so that a defeat would be a personal rebuff, a view shared by Lord Melbourne, who, because he held it was most reluctant--quite rightly--to risk the dissolution of 1841.

(a) J. D. Griffith Davies, George III.

(b) May, Const. Hist., i. 91 f.

That the Queen should not openly take sides, however, was recognised by her, under the influence of Prince Albert, from 1841 (f), and therewith starts the observation of the rule that criticism of the sovereign is forbidden, not merely in Parliament, but also in the Press. This means, of course, that for every royal act of official character, responsibility must be accepted by a minister of the Crown, and throughout the whole reign of the Queen, and ever since that doctrine has been loyally and completely maintained. Moreover, it has every warrant to be upheld, for the claim that it is a fiction (g) is incapable of being seriously sustained.

It is, of course, true that the Stuarts saw the enforcement by the people of responsibility for their governmental acts on (c) King of the Belgians; Letters, 1 s., i. 71.

(d) B. Newman, Lord Melbourne (1934). (e) Letters, 1 s., i. 161 ff.

(f) Martin, Prince Consort, i. 110.

(g) W. I. Jennings, Cabinet Government, pp. 338—40. Responsibility is recognised by Lord Brentford; Taylor, p. 177.

Charles I. and James II., and that it was firmly established that ministers who, like Lord Strafford and Danby, acted in their master's interest and with royal approbation, might none the less suffer or run the risk of suffering severe punishment. The ministers responsible for the Treaty of Utrecht, despite the assent of their sovereign, were at once placed in jeopardy, and Bolingbroke had to seek safety in exile. William III. was unquestionably, in large measure, his own Prime Minister, but Lord Somers was impeached for his action in affixing the great seal to full powers to treat and instruments of ratification of treaties. Under the Hanoverian dynasty, therefore, the position was plain enough; the King could not, by any normal procedure, be brought to book, though rebellion might drive him from his realm, but ministers held office, subject to the risk that the process of impeachment might be employed against them by their enemies, and, though the King could pardon after condemnation, he could not prevent the impeachment proceedings, for the Act of Settlement, 1701, was emphatic on that. If, therefore, ministers were to be held responsible, they must also become in reality responsible, else the position would be intolerable. The doctrine prevailed in the reign of George I. and George II., and in part, at any rate, it was connected with the retirement of these Kings from participation in the framing of policy in Council with ministers. We can see in the case of the action of the British naval forces in the Northern War (h) the restrictions placed on the action of George I. by the fact that his British ministers were answerable to Parliament, though he was absolute in his electorate. He could, therefore, render only by indirect, though not ineffective, means aid to the alliance against Sweden, the opportunity of doing so being afforded by the injuries inflicted on British shipping by Swedish action in the war, which served as a sufficient excuse for reprisals so conducted as to do considerable damage to the Swedish cause. But the King did not ask ministers to assume further responsibility than they were prepared to undertake. Moreover, whereas Queen Anne had insisted on her right to select her ministers independently of party and Parliament (i), and had by her choice in 1702 and 1710 considerably affected the political complexion of the ensuing Parliaments, George II. found that he had little choice in the selection of ministers, as when the Pelhams virtually dictated to him the parting with Cartaret (k). Even George III. had some difficulty in evading Whig dictation, and was lucky in 1770 in finding Lord North ready to undertake the burden of supporting a policy, whose pursuit is a standing example of the danger of hereditary rule. In the triumph of W. Pitt in 1784, however, the electorate and Parliament seemed to give approbation to the independent right of the King to choose his ministers. In 1801 (l) he strengthened the royal position by his discreditable yielding to the wishes of the half-mad sovereign on Catholic emancipation, thereby bringing grave disasters on the realm, and by his emphatic declaration that the King had the sole right of nominating his ministers, and that the House had no right to form any resolution till their conduct came to be judged of by the acts of their administration. There could be no more emphatic assertion of the doctrine that no minister was responsible for the royal choice of a Prime Minister, and his emphasis is the more striking, because his words show clearly that for other acts of administration ministers must take full responsibility, a doctrine enunciated as early as 1711 (m) by Lord Rochester in the striking words that "according to the fundamental constitution of this kingdom ministers must be accountable for all."

(h) Michael, England under George I., i. 287 ff.

It must, however, be remembered that Pitt in his defence of the King was dealing with a ministry, which unquestionably

(i) Hist. MSS. Comm., 9th Report, App., pp. 471 f.

(k) Jenks, Parliamentary England, pp. 158—61.

(l) 35 Parl. Hist. 962.

(m) 6 Parl. Hist. 972, 1083; cf. Duke of Argyle, 1739 (10 ibid. 1138); Sir J. Barnard, 1741 (11 ibid. 1268). Contrast Fox, 1778, who said the King was his own unadvised minister (Todd, Parl. Govt., i. 175).

agreed with the royal policy, and from which he had parted chiefly for personal grounds. In 1807 (n), on the occasion of the enforced retirement of the Grenville ministry and its succession by the Portland ministry, Sir Samuel Romilly laid down the doctrine that it was of the greatest importance to His Majesty that the doctrine of responsible advisers should be strictly maintained. Lord Howick also supported the motion, expressing regret on the late change, on the ground that, while the King's prerogative of choice was admitted, the Commons had the privilege of expressing its views on the fitness of the new ministry for its position. This view, it will be seen, does not touch directly on responsibility, but it goes definitely further than W. Pitt had done. Spencer Perceval, on the other hand, repudiated the doctrine of responsibility; if a ministry were dismissed out of caprice, were those approached to take their places to refuse, and to allow the government of the country to come to a standstill? George Canning also refused responsibility of the new ministry for acts done some weeks before they obtained office. Neither seems to have seen the danger of leaving the King open to attack in the country and in the Press, as must be the case, if there were no responsibility to be assumed by ministers. Yet the election which followed, inter alia, asked for support of the King in exercising every prerogative of the Crown. In 1812 (o) Canning had another opportunity of expressing his views, when on Perceval's death a motion prayed the Prince Regent, who was not hastening the formation of a new ministry, to take steps to form a strong and efficient administration. Canning then admitted the prerogative of choice, but pointed out that the House was a council of advice, as well as of control, and it might be proper to advise the Crown in advance, regarding the character of a ministry, which would be acceptable in lieu of defeating it later on. Here he advances to much the position of Lord Howick in 1807, and still disclaims the idea of responsibility. Perhaps (p) his attitude on this head explains his being given the Premiership in 1827 instead of Wellington or Peel, whom the King had reason to suspect of the intention more or less clearly to dictate to him.

(n) 9 Parl. Deb. 1 s., 327 ff., 345, 471 ff., 552, 629 f. Lord Selkirk pressed for responsibility (ibid. 335, 381). (o) 23 Parl. Deb. 1 s., 249 ff., 267.

But the views even of Canning became obsolete once reform took effect, for the Crown could no longer secure a ministry a majority in Parliament, and Sir R. Peel had the sense to accept the position frankly when he took office after the retirement of Lord Melbourne, and the interim action of the Duke of Wellington in holding a variety of offices pending Peel's arrival. The Duke would have nothing to do with the idea of responsibility (q), the change of ministry was definitely settled before he was called in, and he maintained this doctrine in the Lords, when the issue was pressed against him by Lord Melbourne. Lord Brougham properly insisted that the King could only act through responsible advisers, and that those who took office after a dismissal must be held responsible. Peel himself was clear; on the assumption of a dismissal he denied the personal responsibility of the King, adding "I am responsible for the assumption of the duty which I have undertaken, and, if you please, I am, by my acceptance of office, responsible for the removal of the late Government." The declaration is the more striking, because he confessed that his absence in Italy had prevented him in fact giving the advice for dismissal (r).

There is no doubt of the soundness of this doctrine. It means that there cannot be any occasion on which a ministry can say that such and such an act was done by the King, that they do not approve of it, and that they will not take responsibility for it, but that they will carry on the Government. The objection to such an attitude is that they would be admitting that the people were not sovereign, but that the (p) Emden, The People and the Constitution, p. 146 n. 2.

(q) Peel, Memoirs, ii. 23.

(r) See 26 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 76 ff., 215 ff., 257.

King had a right to dismiss a ministry on his own authority, and that therefore personal rule existed. This would be to deny the validity of the revolutionary settlement of 1688 and the developments of the constitution under the House of Hanover. It would be wholly unconstitutional for a ministry to take this action, and to do so would be peculiarly foolish, because it would expose itself to the attack of all those who put principles above other considerations. It would further be of grave danger to the monarchy. No doubt the Speaker would prevent direct criticism in the Commons, but in the country the King's action would be canvassed vehemently (s), and a direct incentive would be given to bitter attacks on the monarch, and to demands for the removal of all personal discretion, or for the abolition of the monarchy. There can hardly be conceived any concatenation of circumstances which would induce a ministry to place itself in so utterly false a position. Suppose that Edward VIII, in December, 1936, had insisted on his marriage project, and that his ministry had as a result resigned, could any ministry have attempted to take its place with the intention of pleading that it did not approve the royal decision, but that the government of the country must be carried on, and that it would therefore proceed with business ? The answer is plainly in the negative; if there were would-be ministers like Lord Marley, who were prepared to approve the royal view, and to take responsibility for it, the position would have been quite constitutional. But the King, of course, accepted in precise terms at the outset the view that, either he must find a modus vivendi with his existing ministry, or that he must abdicate, a position of the most unimpeachable propriety.

A further consideration must be borne in mind. The King in rejecting the advice of a ministry, or in dismissing it, would in fact only act because he had reason to know that there were ministers who would accept responsibilities for his decision. Granted that William IV. acted without actually communicating first with the Duke of Wellington, or the distant Sir R. Peel, no one suggests that he was not influenced decisively by the just assurance that he had those who would hasten to support the fait accompli, even if, as in Peel's case, they would not have advised the action taken. Fieri non debuit, factum valet. It is significant that in the discussions, at such length, regarding the policy (t) which the King ought to adopt towards the question of the appointment of peers in 1910—11 and the treatment of the Government of Ireland Bill in 1914, the opposition leaders were perfectly clear that they must at once undertake the burden of defending the royal action, and that they could not for a moment shelter behind the King. Needless to say in the decisive days of 1931, the opposition attacked the Prime Minister in the National Government for its formation, and not the sovereign. The objections to the latter course were patent, as they must always be. The King is certain nowadays of a vast body of unreasoning support, which would rally to him instinctively (u), and against which arguments would be vain, with the result that critics would sooner or later be driven to determined efforts by vilification of royalty and denunciations of expense caused by it to start a definitely republican movement. The existing feeling to the sovereign is essentially based on recognition of the fact that the sovereign takes no sides in politics, that he acts by the advice of ministers, and that for all he does a minister will take responsibility. The fact that this is the constitutional rule can be attacked only at the expense of injuring an essential part of the fabric of government.

(s) Cf. what happened in 1914; E. Legge, King George, i. 77 ff.

It is, of course, true that impartiality is a maxim of perfection, which is hard to attain. A sovereign, moreover, is not by British constitutional practice expected to be merely the formal head of the State, accepting with equal indifference or approval all proposals put by every ministry. That role could historically not be expected, for responsible Government developed from a position in which the King had a personal policy of marked character, and used ministers to effect, rather than to fashion his purposes. But the essence of the constitutional change of the period from 1832 was to alter the character of the royal position. Power passed definitely to ministers, resting on the support of the Commons later, rather on that of the electorate as enlarged in 1867, but the sovereign retained the right to exercise influence. This means, of course, that the sovereign must be kept informed of the course of all important business; that the sovereign must be allowed to express opinions thereon before vital decisions are taken; and that ministers must give the most careful consideration to whatever the sovereign brings before their notice. But what they advise finally thereafter must be accepted by the sovereign unless he is prepared to take the decisive step of replacing ministers by a fresh ministry, if they decline to yield and resign, or in lieu of resignation are dismissed. The latter contingency can no doubt be ignored for normal purposes, and credit given to Mr. Asquith's summary of the situation (x):—

(t) Cf. Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 246 ff., 256 ff.

(u) Cf. T. P. O'Connor's view in Chamberlain, op. cit., p. 249.

“ We have now a well-established tradition of two hundred years, that, in the last resort, the occupant of the throne accepts and acts on the advice of his ministers. The sovereign may have lost something of his personal power and authority, but the Crown has been thereby removed from the storms and vicissitudes of party politics. . . . The rights and duties of a constitutional monarch in this country in regard to legislation are confined within determined and strictly circumscribed limits. He is entitled and bound to give his ministers all relevant information which comes to him; to point out to them objections which seem to him valid against the course which they advise; to suggest (if he thinks fit) an alternative policy. . . . But in the end the sovereign always acts upon the advice which ministers, after full deliberation and (if need be) reconsideration, feel it their duty to offer. They give that advice, well knowing that they can, and probably will, be called to account for it by Parliament."

(x) Spender, ii. 30 (September, 1913).

Mr. Asquith qualified the absolute character of the above by an allusion to the fact that William IV.'s exercise of the power to change his advisers in 1834 was the act of one of the least wise of British monarchs—a rather unkind hit—that, even so, he took advantage of a hint of Lord Melbourne, "but the proceedings were neither well advised nor fortunate. . . . The authority of the Crown was disparaged, and Queen Victoria, during her long reign, was careful never to repeat the mistake of her predecessor." Nor, it may be added, was the precedent of William IV. followed, either by Edward VII. or George V., despite the many difficulties of their reigns, which caused a revival of discussions of the right of dismissal. This issue is of such importance, as regards responsible government, that its consideration is far from academic.

One point may first be noted. How can a sovereign be regarded as acting on ministerial advice when a new Prime Minister is selected? We have actually on record the fact that Queen Victoria carefully avoided asking Mr. Gladstone's advice before choosing Lord Rosebery in 1892 (y), and that Mr. Bonar Law gave none in 1923 (z), when Mr. Baldwin was preferred to Lord Curzon. Must there not be responsibility here? The answer here is that the responsibility rests with the new Prime Minister; for whatever reason he happens to receive the royal invitation to form a ministry, he is wholly at liberty to decline to do so (a), and he ought so to decline if constitutional propriety under the British system does not

(y) Morley, Gladstone, iii. 512.

(z) Dugdale, Balfour, ii. 360, asserts that Mr. Bonar Law's health forbade consultation. But he seems to have thought consultation not customary; Ronaldshay, Curzon, iii. 350. But it is common.

(a) See Lords Hartington's and Granville's action in 1880; Fitzmaurice, i. 193 f.

mark out his appointment as right and proper on the part of the sovereign. When, therefore, he accepts office, he assumes therewith the duty of defending the formation of the new ministry, and no criticism of the Crown would be permitted in the Commons by the Speaker, even if any member were so lacking in sense of constitutional propriety as to make it. It must be added that in most cases the duty of the sovereign under modern usage is perfectly plain, and that any discussion of what is done can hardly arise; where it does, as in the events of 1931, the responsibility of the Prime Minister has been emphasised in the Commons, and in the country generally the constitutional position has been readily understood in the Press, and in public discussion.

Of these principles there are abundant illustrations from Dominion practice, though in the earlier days of responsible government, and even now in the States of Australia and the Provinces of Canada, dismissal or refusal of advice of ministers is easier to defend than in Britain, with its closer adherence to political regularity, while the Governor may err in judgment without affecting seriously the position of the Crown (b).

(b) Cabinet Responsibility and the Abdication of Edward VIII.

The abdication of Edward VIII. illustrates admirably the character of Cabinet responsibility. Despite a rather inexplicable conspiracy of silence on the part of the British Press, rather fascist than democratic in character, it had become known, in part through foreign papers, that the King was anxious to marry a United States citizen, who had obtained one divorce already, and who in order to contract marriage must obtain another, this time in England. It was obvious to the Prime Minister, who at first acted alone, that grave difficulties would arise if the King married a lady who had twice obtained divorces, and that she would not be acceptable as Queen. The Cabinet, when consulted, concurred in this view of the Premier, and like opinions were naturally held by the Dominion Governments, which were necessarily consulted, and which, in addition to advising the King through the British Government, also communicated direct in the hope that the sovereign would find it possible to abandon his project of abdication, if marriage were otherwise ruled out. A suggestion to save the situation by the equivalent of a morganatic marriage was mooted for the King, but necessarily negatived, as wholly out of keeping with British ideas of marriage, and the relation between the spouses thence resulting, though such a marriage might have evaded the difficulties arising, as regards Dominion action in the event of abdication (c).

(b) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions (1928).

The King, therefore, persisted in abdication, and for that decision on him there rested moral responsibility of a serious kind, as the Archbishop of Canterbury stressed in a broadcast immediately after the completion of the abdication. Plainly he was not advised to take this step by the ministry, which had no desire whatever to have the position of the monarchy, and the prestige of the country, lowered by the spectacle of the sovereign preferring marriage with a lady twice divorced by her own initiative, to the retention of the Imperial Crown. But the Cabinet had no alternative but to assume responsibility for the resignation ex post facto, by promoting and carrying the necessary legislation to give it effect (d). There was, indeed, a suggestion for a moment that their position might be challenged on the score that they had advised the King that the marriage contemplated would not be acceptable, and had made it clear that they would not remain in office if he insisted on remaining on the throne, and contracting the marriage. There is no doubt whatever that they were responsible for this attitude, but it was speedily obvious to those who tried to attack them that it would be wholly impossible for Mr. Churchill, or any other person who might sympathise with the King, to form a ministry if the Government resigned. In the result, therefore, the action taken was not questioned seriously, and His Majesty's Declaration of Abdication Act, 1936, was duly enacted to provide for the passage of the Crown to George VI. as on a demise of the Crown, and to exclude the ex-King and any offspring from any claim to the succession. At the same time the ex-King was excluded, as well as any offspring, from the operation of the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, being thus enabled to contract marriage without the assent of the sovereign. He was also, no doubt on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, given the rank of Duke, and later that of His Royal Highness was recognised as appertaining to him, but not to his wife or children (e). In this case, no doubt, the King must have acted on ministerial advice, so as to avoid any criticism of the sovereign on the ground of the novel differential treatment of the wife, as if her marriage did not place her in the normal position of equality to her husband. It does not seem that any precedent existed for the differentiation. The Countess of Inverness, the title given by the Queen in 1840 to the second wife of the Duke of Sussex, whose first marriage was pronounced void under the Act of 1772 (f), was in a completely different position, as she had never in law been married to the Duke, from whom his first wife parted after the decision of George III. not to recognise the marriage, and who therefore was really rather in the position of a so-called morganatic wife.

(c) Mr. Baldwin, 318 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 2186—96. Cf. Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 3—13.

(d) His Majesty's Declaration of Abdication Act, 1936 (1 Ed. VIII. c. 3).

2. Ministerial Responsibility and the Dismissal of Ministers.

Never since 1783 has actual dismissal of ministers taken place, but the resignation of the Grenville ministry in 1807 (g) was enforced by the demand of the King for an assurance that it would not tender him advice in regard to Catholic emancipation, and that it could not properly have given. The case of the Melbourne ministry in 1834, though long regarded as one of dismissal, cannot now be treated in that light, because Lord Melbourne (h), when Lord Althorp, became no longer available to lead the Commons on the death of his father, frankly gave the King complete liberty of action in a written communication, and though at an interview he suggested that Lord J. Russell—a persona ingrata to the King—might succeed Lord Althorp, it does not appear that he made any attempt to urge the King, or that he recanted his earlier advice. It is, therefore, impossible to regard the royal action as a case of dismissal, nor does it matter much that the King was influenced by the inability of the ministry to secure support in the Upper House, a consideration now irrelevant, or that he disagreed with his ministry, as to its chance of keeping a majority in the Commons. Sir R. Peel held the King's act bad, and Mr. Gladstone ruled it rash, while Mr. Asquith's observation has been cited above. Perhaps these dicta are a little severe. The King might well think that the ministry was not particularly capable or energetic, apart from his dislike of its doctrines.

(e) See Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, p. 6 n. 1.

(f) The Sussex Peerage Case (1844), 11 Cl. & F. 85. For the burial of the Duke in Kensal Green cemetery, see Letters, 1 s., i. 478 f.

(g) See p. 356, ante.

An interesting discussion of the right of a Governor-General to dismiss a ministry arose in 1873 on the famous issue of the Pacific Railway scandals in Canada. The Conservative ministry of Sir J. Macdonald had hopelessly compromised itself by its dealings with a railway magnate and others, and the issue arose of the extent to which the Governor-General ought to use his authority to secure the resignation of the ministry. The Queen's interest (i) was aroused by what she thought was a suggestion by the Colonial Secretary that the Governor-General would be bound to accept as conclusive a vote of the Dominion Parliament on this issue, though the vote of the majority might prove to be vitiated in its composition. She evidently held that Lord Dufferin would have been justified if he thought it right to require resignation, or to dismiss, even if the vote were favourable. Nor is it clear that she was not right in this view, for the approval of the Commons implies that the members who approve are not themselves implicated in wrongdoing. In fact the attitude of the Commons induced Sir J. Macdonald to retire. There is, however, on record a statement by Sir C. Tupper (j) that in fact the Governor-General had meant to dismiss the Premier, but was persuaded by him not to take this step, as it would place him in the fatal position of being accused of political partisanship. That, of course, is the essential risk, which renders caution necessary. But Lord Kimberley did not dispute the right to dismiss, and in 1878 both Mr. Gladstone (k) and Mr. Disraeli (l) treated it as beyond question; the latter made an interesting point in his allocution; he insisted that, as his ministry had a majority in both Houses, it could not properly resign, but it could be dismissed. The Queen herself had seemingly meditated in 1859 forcing a dissolution, in order to secure the negativing of the dangerous pro-Italian attitude of her Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, but the fact that she could rely, through Lord Granville, on the moderating influence of the majority of the Cabinet relieved her of the necessity of resorting to so dangerous a step.

(h) Melbourne Papers, pp. 220 ff.; Gladstone, Gleanings of Past Years, i. 231.

(i) Letters, 2 s., ii. 285, 288 f., 292.

In 1893 (m) the Queen was much perturbed at the possibility of Mr. Gladstone raising an agitation against the Lords on the rejection of the Home Rule Bill therein, and through Lord Rowton, whom she had learned to trust as Lord Beaconsfield's secretary, she asked for Lord Salisbury's advice as to whether she could force a dissolution, e.g., if approached after the rejection of the Bill in the Lords by a numerously signed petition, or an address from the Lords, asking for a (j) Keith, Imperial Unity, pp. 113 f.

(k) Gleanings of Past Years, i. 230 ff.

(l) Moneypenny and Buckle, ii. 1118. Cf. in 1872, Sel. Speeches, ii. 493.

(m) Letters, 3 s., ii. 279 ff., 297 ff.

dissolution. Lord Salisbury had the good sense to point out that, if ministers refused to dissolve, and were compelled to resign, they would go to the country with the intention of criticising the mode of exercise of the royal authority, if not as actual opponents of it. "No one can foresee what the upshot of such a state of things would be ! It might be good; or it might be bad ! But there must be some hazard that, in the end, such a step would injure the authority of the Queen." It was, therefore, undesirable to act without urgent reason, which did not exist. The legislation proposed by the Government on disestablishment in Wales or Scotland, or on local option, would do them no good, and by next year the errors, if any, of his administration would be forgotten, and the Government much more unpopular. In 1894 (n) the issue was revived in a peculiar form. The Queen was very anxious, as usual, that nothing should be done against the Lords, and Lord Rosebery on this subject was suspect. She maintained against him two propositions, one that he should not announce a new policy until he had obtained for it the approval of the Crown, and, secondly, that before moving resolutions regarding the relations of the Houses there should be a dissolution of Parliament. Lord Salisbury's advice, on both heads, was in favour of the royal doctrines. But his opinion was counteracted by the views of Sir Henry James (o), who was ultimately supported by the Dukes of Devonshire and Argyll, and Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Balfour. His contention was evidently based on the commonsense view that there was nothing improper in a Prime Minister moving resolutions, which, of course, could have no immediate effect or importance. On the other hand, while the right of the sovereign to insist on a dissolution was clear, the modus operandi must be either by the accord of the Prime Minister or, if he refused, by accepting his resignation and dissolving on the advice of a new ministry. Even if Lord Rosebery agreed to dissolve, he would have to explain his motives, and the election might then be affected by the discussion whether the position of the Queen was in order, while, if the new ministry dissolved, the result of the dissolution would not be a verdict on the issue in question, but would extend to other matters. He made it quite clear, however, that the Queen would be entitled to insist on a dissolution, if she were asked to create peers to override the Lords, or even if the Government were to present to Parliament a Bill of a very revolutionary or destructive character. Neither contingency, of course, was then in sight, and the Queen wisely dropped the subject.

(n) Ibid. 431.

(o) Letters, 3 s., ii. 442—44.

But it naturally was revived when the struggle over the Parliament Bill became acute. In April, 1910 (p), we find Mr. Balfour contemplating that Mr. Asquith would endeavour to place the King in an impasse by approaching him at a time when funds were running short, and asking him for a pledge to create 500 peers, or at least a dissolution now, or in January. The King would, on refusal, be confronted with resignation, and when Mr. Balfour was asked to form a ministry he would find it impossible to do so, in view of the hostility of the House and the financial position. Mr. Balfour, however, was inclined, in such an event, to take office if the financial difficulty could be got over, which Mr. A. Chamberlain thought was possible; the difficulties, as he saw them, were the penalties for illegal use of funds and the attitude of the Comptroller and Auditor-General. But, what is rather amazing, while Mr. Balfour recognised that the dissolution, which he would at once advise, must be final, Mr. A. Chamberlain (q) was prepared to argue that, if the majority for the opposition were 80, 50, 30 instead of 120, the King would still be bound to refuse to accede to Mr. Asquith's demands, and should recall Mr. Balfour and allow him a fresh dissolution. It is remarkable that so unconstitutional a doctrine should have been placed on record. To act thus would be a complete betrayal of the duty of the Crown, and in effect a revolution; the fact that Mr. A. Chamberlain held the view marks him out as essentially lacking in that respect for the electorate, which is the duty of all Parliamentarians; though Mr. Balfour agreed not to stress the final character of an election, it would be absurd to credit that he accepted so subversive and, indeed, disgraceful a proposal. Happily the King's death saved him the trouble of a decision. It seems from Lord Esher's record (r) of a Lambeth Palace meeting on April 27th that Mr. Balfour, though guarded in expression, was inclined to think that the King should refuse to give a contingent undertaking to create peers, and was prepared, if he did so, to take office and dissolve. But whether the King would have agreed with this view remains unknown.

(p) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 256 f., 262, 268,
(q) Politics from Inside, p. 264.

George V. decided on November 16th (s) to give the contingent promise asked for, dependent on the result of the election in December, but this fact was not published, and very oddly, Lord Morley is recorded on December 12th (t) as expressing the view that the King might refuse to create 500 peers if the occasion arose, in which case the ministry would resign, and Mr. Balfour would take office, and by dissolving might obtain a majority from a fatigued electorate. It is impossible to understand this expression of opinion in the circumstances, and Mr. Balfour himself on December 27th, in writing to Lord Lansdowne, held that a further dissolution, in view of the electoral result, must be regarded as impossible (u).

The issue arose once more over the Government of Ireland Bill. That measure, the last chance of preserving the name and authority of the Crown in Ireland, erred undoubtedly in its—apparently tactical (x)—insistence of treating Ireland as a unity, though the error was one which Conservatives could not logically censure, for they had obstinately insisted in (r) Journals, ii. 456 f.

(s) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 296 f.

(t) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 427.

(u) Newton, Lansdowne, p. 407; Dugdale, ii. 63 ff.

(x) Churchill, World Crisis, 1911–14, pp. 181 f.

preserving intact the union, in face of the fact that it was deeply resented in Southern Ireland, where it was never forgotten that the Union had been secured by bribery and corruption, and that it had never operated, as had the Union with Scotland, essentially in the economic interest of the country. The resistance to the Governmental proposal led unhappily to the determination of men like Sir E. Carson (y) and Mr. F. E. Smith to raise an organised force in Ulster to defy the authority of the Crown. The Government committed the inexcusable error of refusing to take legal proceedings against the Ulster volunteers, with the result that a rival force of National Volunteers soon sprang up, and the way was prepared for the rebellion of 1916, for the revolutionary movement, which destroyed in 1921 the resolution and power of resistance of Mr. Lloyd George and the coalition Government, and for the Constitution of Eire, under which the Crown is eliminated from the government of Eire, and reduced to the status of a facultative instrument for limited international purposes, acting under the directions of the virtually republican Government of Eire (z).

An effort was made by the ministry to solve the issue before it was too late (a). It was proposed to allow contracting-out of the Act by counties, Belfast and Londonderry ranking in this category for the purposes of the Act; exclusion was to be for six years, a period allowing, of course, for further Parliamentary decision after a new election, and after actual experience of the operation of the constitution. But the proposal was rejected, nominally because of the time limit, really, no doubt, because of the fact that five counties and Londonderry itself might well be willing to remain under the Act. The negotiations, which followed, were long and confused, and an amending measure presented to the Lords on June 23rd suffered severely at its hands. On July 21st—

(y) See I. Colvin, Carson, ii. For a bad excuse for the Government see Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 22—24.

(z) Keith, The Dominions as Sovereign States (1938).

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 16 ff., 34 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 543 ff.

24th a conference (b), summoned by the King on Mr. Asquith's advice, sought to settle the issue; Mr. Asquith was aided by Mr. Lloyd George, the Conservatives were Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Bonar Law, Ulster and the Nationalists had two members apiece. The result was failure, for agreement could not be reached on the question of the exclusion from the Act of Tyrone and Fermanagh or parts thereof, for these areas were by no means clearly anti-Home Rule; the time limit question was not settled, but might have been accommodated. In the result the Government decided to propose on July 30th, on receiving the Lords' amendments, to proceed with county option, but without a time limit for its operation, but instead, as suggested by Sir E. Carson, with a facultative optional inclusion, if counties so desired. The outbreak of war rendered a satisfactory settlement impossible, for the Conservatives could not see the importance of conciliating Ireland if her aid were to be fully assured in the war, and the ministry therefore had to carry the Act over the head of the Lords, but accompanied by an Act suspending its operation for a year, or until a later date, if the war was not over. At the same time assurances were duly given that Parliament would have an amending measure before it, while the Act was still suspended, and that force would not be countenanced for the compulsion of Ulster.

During this period the most remarkable views found free expression. Mr. Balfour (c) unquestionably thought that the King should have insisted on a fresh mandate for the coercion of Ulster, no doubt on the score that this resistance had not been before the electorate; no doubt the obvious reply is that to accept such an argument would be to put a premium on rebellion organised by the opposition. But he thought that, if the King shared his view, he should not refuse assent to the Bill, which might seem unconstitutional, but should dismiss his ministers, and send for Lord Rosebery, or himself,

(b) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 55—57
(c) Dugdale, ii. 99, 100.

to hold office merely for the taking of the expression of the will of the people. The scheme was plainly Utopian, and does not seem to have been urged publicly. On the other hand, he took up the position (d) that, while the King could do nothing if he were opposed to the ministry's plans, if he sympathised with them, or were impartial, he could properly insist on an election to clear the air. Lord Lansdowne (e) insisted that the passing of the Parliament Act by destroying the power of the Lords to force reference to the people placed the duty on the King. He might, therefore, demand from his ministers either a dissolution or a referendum. He declared that there was nothing to be feared from South Ireland if the Bill were rejected, and contracting out was dismissed as "absurd and impracticable," epithets which deprive him of any claim to intelligent insight into the Irish issue—no doubt he lived too near to the facts to be able to discern essentials. It is interesting that Mr. Balfour (f) even then thought of complete colonial self-government for Nationalist Ireland, rejecting the federal solution, which some of the Conservative intelligentsia were urging. Mr. Bonar Law was as gloomy as he could be. He asserted the right of the King to dismiss, and to give a dissolution to a new ministry. But he recognised that this meant personal responsibility and risks, for against the attacks of the extreme supporters of the Government must be set the bitter and lasting resentment of the people of Ulster and their sympathisers—he ignored, as usual, the mass of Nationalists in Ulster, and their views. If coercion were tried before the electors had decided, the Conservatives were pledged to give every support, and he doubted if the army would act. But, if the election went for the Government, the party would give Ulster no support, while, if the opposition won, they would reduce by half the number of Irish members, and hear no more of Home Rule. It is rather pathetic to read of so strange a delusion, when within eight years Nationalist Ireland was by moral resolution and military action to defeat the coalition Government, and force the grant of all but complete independence. Political judgment was not brilliantly represented at this juncture. Lord Rosebery held that refusal of assent to a Bill would be definitely unconstitutional, and urged the holding of a conference, which would not satisfy Ulster, but might satisfy the conscience of Ulster and Britain. Mr. Cave (g) urged the King to use his prerogative of dissolution, while others urged him to refuse assent to the Bill. Sir W. Anson (h), while clear that the King had a right to insist on a reference to the people, pointed out that he could dissolve only by persuading his ministry, or by securing an alternative ministry, which would be prepared to take responsibility. Professor Dicey (i) upheld the same view, and Lord Hugh Cecil (k) stressed the essential doctrine that the King could refuse ministerial advice in such cases, and those only, in which he could find ministers prepared to undertake to defend his action.

(d) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 26.

(e) Ibid. ii. 25.
(f) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, p. 644. Cf. Dugdale, ii. 336—43.

The reply of Mr. Asquith (l) to these contentions was the only one possible. The Lords had claimed the right to force reference to the people at their discretion, and the result had been a constitutional crisis, ended by the denial of their claims by the Parliament Act, 1911. It was most undesirable that the position of the King should be raised in the same way. If once he was asked by a Conservative opposition to refer a matter, he would equally be asked by a Liberal or Radical opposition, and his action would be involved in the case of every important Bill. Moreover, at a dissolution after an intervention necessitating dismissal of ministers, the Crown would become the football of contending factions, a contingency which should be most carefully avoided.

(g) The Times, September 6th, 1913.

(h) Ibid. September 10th, 1913.

(i) Ibid. September 15th, 1913; cf. Colvin, Carson, ii. 240.

(k) Ibid. September 10th, 1913.

(l) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 30, 31.

Mr. Asquith further stressed the dangers of offending the feelings and disappointing the hopes of Southern Ireland, which would become ungovernable if the Bill were not passed. The idea of an election would solve nothing, for Sir E. Carson and his friends would not abate their resistance, whatever that decided, nor could it be otherwise, if men really held their liberty and religion to be in jeopardy. If the Government were defeated, the verdict would not really be on the Bill, but, as in the recent by-elections on the Insurance Act, the Marconi contract, and a score of other issues. Again, the election would destroy the whole purpose of the Parliament Act, which was framed simply to prevent the recurrence of the power of the Lords to force a dissolution. On the other hand, it would be possible to arrange that there should be a general election before the Act was brought into operation. This last point affords unquestionably the answer to the much discussed question whether the Governmental attitude was sound, and such as could be accepted by the King. His one right to act was based on the possibility that the ministry had ceased to speak for the people, and the Prime Minister's proposal offered the necessary assurance on that head by making it plain that the people would at an early date be consulted, before the position had been stereotyped. This point is important, for, if the proposal had really been to alter matters so radically, that the matter could not be reconsidered, the issue would have presented different aspects.

No doubt it is a very serious matter for the King to determine that the ministry does not really represent the will of the people, so that he is justified in insisting on a dissolution, which normally would mean removing ministers; enforced resignation or dismissal is a point of no real importance (m). The difficulty is that it is so hard to know what the people will do, and there is always one grave fact to be faced. The dismissed ministry will make a point of the fact, that by constitutional usage, its advice should have prevailed. That consideration may result in the electorate disregarding the issue first involved, and voting instead in whole or in part, on the score that the dismissal was not constitutional. Nor is this mere hypothesis; in 1926, in the electoral contest in Canada, which ensued on Lord Byng's refusal of a dissolution to Mr. Mackenzie King, followed by a grant of one to Mr. Meighen on Mr. King's resignation, no serious doubt can be felt that the issue was largely determined by the skill with which Mr. King raised the constitutional issue.

(m) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions (1928), i. pp. xxi. f., 146—52.

There are further difficulties in the way of the King obtaining information. He has, of course, open the views of the Press, which are singularly difficult to evaluate, especially as under modern conditions newspapers fall under the control of "Press lords," who normally show little flair for the opinion of the people. He has the evidence of by-elections, but no one can say precisely how much these mean; local considerations are often decisive in such cases, and a seat won at a by-election often reverts to its previous holders at the general election following. He has the views of his entourage, which may be supplemented by those of leaders of the opposition obtained by discussion with the sanction of the Prime Minister, or offered spontaneously, or learned through his private secretary, or otherwise. We must not under-rate the importance of such material, nor can we say that the King must accept on such a question the opinion of the ministry, but plainly it is requisite that the case should be very clear before the King deliberately takes a step, which may endanger gravely the prestige and future powers of the Crown.

It is not, however, sufficient to say that the Government have a mandate for a policy, as the Liberal party certainly had one for the Home Rule legislation, for there had intervened a very serious issue, which was not originally foreseen the extent of preparations for resistance in Ulster (n), and the effect on the British army. Few things are more depressing from the constitutional point of view than the record of the participation of Unionist leaders in preparation to defy the sovereignty of the Crown, and to destroy its forces, but even more deplorable is the record of high officers of the army. It is known (o) that Mr. Bonar Law discussed with Sir Henry Wilson, the Director of Military Operations, desperate measures to save a desperate situation, and that the same officer discussed the position with Lord Milner, Dr. Jameson, and Sir E. Carson, their common interest being the organisation and training of forces in Ulster, against whose resistance would be shattered any attempt to put in operation an Act of Parliament to which the royal assent had been given. No excuse can be made for these persons or their associates, but the severest condemnation, of course, must fall on Sir Henry Wilson for his treachery to those he served. On the other hand there is little excuse to be found for the attitude of the Secretary of State for War and the Army Council (p), for in December, 1913, Sir Arthur Paget, Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, was allowed to permit officers domiciled in Ulster to "disappear" without prejudice to their prospects, if the army was called upon to deal with disturbances in Ulster. This was followed by an incredible piece of blundering by the War Office, and Sir A. Paget in March, 1914, when officers at the Curragh were given the impression of being asked forthwith to commence operations against the Ulster volunteers, or of refusing and being dismissed, save those of Ulster domicile.

(n) The Ulster Unionist Council started resistance in September, 1911, and a Covenant was opened for signature in September, 1912. Gun-running took place at Larne (April 24th—25th, 1914), unpunished. The Nationalists raised volunteers and ran guns at Howth (July 26th), with some loss of life. In neither case was justice done; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 49, 55.

(o) Callwell, Wilson, i. ch. viii., ix. Cf. Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 624 ff.

(p) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 41 ff.; J. E. B. Seely, Adventure, pp. 166 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1905—16, pp. 546 ff. For Sir E. Carson's advice to the King, see Repington, The First World War, i. 69.

It must be remembered that all that was then being considered was the provision of adequate security for police barracks and depots of arms and ammunition in Ulster, an elementary duty of the Crown and of the army. The raising of a question of crushing resistance in Ulster in these circumstances was incredibly foolish, so much so that it is not surprising that bad faith was at the time suspected by those who did not realise the essential limitations of the military mind, which were so shortly to be revealed so generously in the disasters of the Great War. As it was, General Hubert Gough and fifty-seven officers of the 3rd Cavalry Brigade expressed preference for dismissal. Their action caused a painful sensation, the opposition leaders supported them, as they could hardly avoid doing, and the leaders of the malcontents were ordered to report themselves to the Adjutant-General at the War Office, where the duties expected of them were properly explained. As set out in an Army Order issued soon after, the principles are in brief that (1) no officer or soldier should in future be questioned by his superior officer as to the attitude he will adopt, or as to his action, in the event of his being required to obey orders dependent upon future or hypothetical contingencies. (2) An officer or soldier is forbidden in future to ask for assurances as to orders which he may be required to obey. (3) In particular, it is the duty of every officer and soldier to obey all lawful commands given to them through the proper channel, either for the safeguarding of public property or the support of the civil power in the ordinary execution of its duty, or for the protection of the lives and property of the inhabitants in the case of disturbance of the peace. This action should have ended the matter, but by an incredible blunder, which has never been explained, Colonel Seely added to the memorandum giving, in substance, the above rulings an assurance that the Government had no intention of taking advantage of the right to use the forces of the Crown to crush political opposition to the policy or principles of the Home Rule Bill. Plainly,

Colonel Seely's action was completely inconsistent with the principles laid down; if it were not right to ask an officer what he would do in a hypothetical contingency, still less could it be right for an officer to ask the Government to give him any such assurance, and General Gough, at whose request Colonel Seely had acted, was informed that the assurance must be deemed cancelled. Colonel Seely's action was indefensible, while the Conservatives lent themselves to support the intrigues of Sir H. Wilson, who consulted Mr. Bonar Law, and from the War Office primed opposition leaders with questions intended to embarrass the Government. Mr. Churchill (q) committed an indiscretion by orders for naval movements, which afforded the basis for an absolutely unfounded rumour that the army and navy were to engage in combined action against the Ulster volunteers, and the capture of their headquarters by a coup de main. In the Commons feeling ran high, when on March 23rd, 24th, and 25th the issue was debated, for many, besides Liberals, realised that, if the claims put forward were admitted, the Government and the House of Commons would be put at the mercy of the army and navy. The Labour members pointed the moral that, if officers could refuse to serve, the rank and file would follow their lead if called upon to deal with other forms of civil disorder than those feared in Ulster, and Mr. John Ward quoted a syndicalist leaflet just distributed, asking soldiers to remember that officers had exercised an option in obeying orders, and calling upon them to resolve never to fire on their own class.

Colonel Seely had already resigned, and Mr. Asquith himself on March 30th took the seals of the War Department, thereby rendering himself ineligible for Parliament until re-elected. On April 4th at Ladybank he reminded his constituents of the doctrine of the elder Pitt in 1745: "The right of inquiring what measures may conduce to the advantage and security of the public belongs not to the army, but to this House. . . . Our armies have no better right to determine for themselves than any other body of them, nor are we to suffer them to prescribe laws to the Legislature, or to govern those by whose authority they subsist."

(q) World Crisis, 1911—14, p. 184. Cf. Fitzroy Memoirs, ii. 542—546: "shuffling imbecility."

The mischief, however, was irremediable, and the mutiny of officers was to lead in 1911 to the mutiny of naval ranks at Invergordon, which shook confidence in British stability throughout the world, and immediately drove Britain off the gold standard. The attitude of the Conservative party in taking advantage for political purposes of the unrest in the ranks of the officers and their relations with Sir H. Wilson—an officer whose military career was undistinguished, and whose political interventions of much injury to British interest—establish a precedent for supporting disloyalty in the army, just as their sympathy with preparations in Ulster to resist the Crown established a precedent for preparations for civil war. To ignore these facts is useless, and the Crown must now always take into consideration in regard to action on advice of ministers, the possibility of such advice producing a mutiny in the defence forces. That mutiny in such a case is constitutional was definitely the view of the Unionist leaders in 1914 (r), and none of the comments, since published by them, depart from that position.

There is, therefore, no possibility of assuming that the Crown can safely adopt the rule that the advice of ministers must always be accepted, and the Curragh incident was rendered the more unsatisfactory, because of the gross negligence of the ministry in failing forthwith to report to the King the events in question, which he learned first from the Press (s). His distress, or indignation, was most natural, and his insistence that no further instances of such negligence must happen. The idea that matters of this kind can take place without the fullest consultation with the King is intolerable, and the sovereign would have been in a very strong position had he chosen in the event to dismiss ministers for this failure of duty.

(r) Cf. Lord Brentford's advocacy of civil war in 1913—14: Taylor, pp. 127 f.

(s) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii., 47. Allegations of unconstitutional initiative by the King were decisively denied by Mr. Asquith on March 25th: E. Legge, King George, i. 113 ff.

Even those who hold most strongly that the sovereign should act on advice have to admit that this cannot be insisted upon to the extent of accepting the destruction of the essential principle of responsible government, the periodical appeal to the people. If, indeed, the idea of automatic action were to be pressed, it would have to be accompanied by safeguards that the power of a ministry should not be abused, for example, by requiring that a reference to the people in some form should be necessary if a certain proportion of the Commons demanded it. As matters stand the King could not properly assent to any measure to extend the life of an existing Parliament, unless there were general assent, as, no doubt, existed for the extension of the life of Parliament during the Great War. But could he assent to a measure of franchise reform, which deprived a large section of the franchise, or gave additional votes to a section, or which effected an unfair redistribution of seats? In such cases very grave issues might easily arise, for it is most unlikely that any ministry would put forward proposals so obviously unjust as to make it easy for the King to refuse assent to a Bill, or as would be preferable, to change his ministers before the matter went so far. The issue might again arise in such a case as the approval of a treaty, whether with or without legislation. Could the King accept a compact which violated the principles on which the ministry had obtained office at the preceding general election?

These questions are not academic, for the Hoare-Laval agreement, 1935, as to a possible settlement of the Ethiopian issue was so manifestly incompatible with the terms of the Covenant of the League of Nations that, had they been persisted in, the King would have been placed in a very awkward position. As matters stood, the Commons reacted to the widespread protests among electors, and the policy was for the moment dropped. Later developments revealed the ministry unable to persist in the policy of support of the League, but the increasing danger of war in Europe rendered royal intervention singularly difficult, apart from the fact that the position of the monarchy itself had been gravely affected by the abdication of Edward VIII. in circumstances calculated to lessen the respect due to, and the prestige of, the sovereign (t). Moreover, it is plain that royal intervention is always prima facie undesirable, and should be resorted to only as an ultima ratio. These considerations explain why in April, 1938, it was not widely felt proper to petition the sovereign to disapprove the Anglo-Italian agreement of April 16th, though that agreement contemplated the recognition of the Italian conquest of Ethiopia de jure, an act which involved George VI. in a deliberate violation of George V.'s solemn undertaking under Article 20 of the League Covenant not to enter into any agreement contrary to the provisions thereof (u). The failure of the ministry to keep to the principles, on the strength of which it attained support from the nation at the election of 1935, marks, no doubt, a definite abandonment of the exclusion from party strife of foreign politics, and may render difficult in future the royal position.

The uncertainty of the outlook in the constitutional sphere is increased, when it is remembered that the policy of a section, if not the whole, of the Labour party is to announce a policy for the next election of the effective introduction of socialisation of finance and industry to be effected by means demanding immediate royal intervention. The proposals would demand the immediate passing of an Emergency Powers Act, giving authority to the ministry to carry out by Orders in Council socialisation, and including provisions, excluding effective interference by the Courts, or, at least, the right of the Commons to annul any ruling by the Courts pronouncing any step taken illegal. For this purpose it would presumably be necessary forthwith to obtain the swamping of the House of Lords, with a view to its ceasing to obstruct any measures proposed, and the Crown would be expected to give assent forthwith to such action. It is plain, that in practice, the issue might present grave difficulties for royal action in this summary manner. Obviously financial interests opposed to the plan would be mobilised to use their power to destroy the ministry, and it would be doubtless necessary to legislate to impose drastic penalties on such attempts. That the King must, in such circumstances, be the object of strong pressure is plain, and it would be difficult for him to agree, thus summarily, to destroy the Upper Chamber, unless on clear evidence of a mandate from the people, and the circumstances of elections do not, it is plain (v), give normally any clear mandate. The existence of the Parliament Act, 1911, would certainly furnish a strong argument in favour of the view that its terms should be made use of, for action to alter the economic system; but the difficulty, of course, is that the delay, thence resulting, might undermine the position of the party, subject as it would be to capitalist intrigue, which might easily extend to efforts to sap the loyalty of the defence forces. The existence, however, of the reserve power of the Crown must be stressed as a factor making for moderation, which is the safest course of procedure in a democracy of the British type, easily affected by repulsion to methods of violence.

(t) See p. 368, ante.

(u) Kcith, The Scotsman, April 19th, 1938; Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5726.

A further case, where the Crown is deeply concerned, is the maintenance under the constitution of law and order. The royal assent is necessary to a proclamation of emergency, and clearly cannot be given without the adduction of evidence that it is essential, as plainly was the case in 1926, when that dangerous conspiracy against the security of the realm, in the form of the general strike (x), was defeated by the encouragement afforded to the loyal population by the steps taken by the ministry to vindicate the elementary rights of the subject. Here, as usual, it is possible, as a rule, for the Crown merely to exercise negative influence; in the period when the Ulster and the Nationalist volunteers were defying law in Ireland the sovereign was not able effectively to intervene to demand ministerial action to enforce the law; no doubt the blame for failure rests largely on Mr. J. Redmond's urgent objections against any action against Sir E. Carson and his supporters, but the fact remains that the lawlessness of these two bodies was inevitably the precursor of the Irish rebellion, and the elimination of the sovereign from the Irish constitution. Yet to dismiss a ministry on such a ground would have been impracticable.

(v) See pp. 304 ff., 379, ante.

(x) Taylor, Brentford, pp. 192 ff.

One point remains to be considered. Has the King a right by threat of abdication to force ministers to yield to his wishes? The abdication of a sovereign, it may be thought, as a result of ministers insisting on a line of policy disapproved by him, would injure their position so much that ministers might rather yield than dispute. Queen Victoria occasionally uttered a threat; thus, on August 10th, 1871 (y), she intimated that, unless ministers enabled her to leave for Balmoral before prorogation, she could not go on, and must give her heavy burden up to younger hands, a statement which it must have been difficult to take seriously. In the Russo-Turkish crisis, however, in 1876—78 (z) the Queen used more seriously this dangerous weapon, but it is reasonable to suppose that in this, as in the rest of her curious activities at this period, she was acting very much on the instigation of her Prime Minister, who was certainly clever enough to use this method of securing his own way with the Cabinet, though Lord Carnarvon was put out by her interventions. On

(y) Guedalla, i. 300. Cf. Mr. Gladstone's comment, taking reluctantly responsibility, 303 f.

(z) Monypenny and Buckle, Disraeli, ii. 1017, 1020, 1089, 1117 (June 14th, 27th, 1877; January 10th, February 9th, 1878).

May 17th, 1885 (a), a more just note is struck, in writing to Lord Hartington against the Governmental policy of evacuating the Sudan: "The Queen writes strongly, but she cannot resign if matters go ill, and her heart bleeds to see such short-sighted humiliating policy pursued, which lowers her country before the whole world." To this attitude she appears to have adhered for the many years still left of her wonderful reign.

Abdication seems occasionally to have occurred to Edward VII., but rather as a mode of relieving himself from a position rendered irksome by ill-health and worry, due to the bitterness of contending parties, than as a means to enforce his personal views of policy. Of George V. we have the assertion that "nothing could be further from the truth than the story repeated in after days, that he lost his self-control and threatened to abdicate" (b). His efforts to secure a compromise settlement of the issue of Home Rule were unceasing, but they were not reinforced by the suggestion of abdication. To have made it would have been definitely to take sides against the Government or the opposition, which is precisely the thing which a King should never do.

The attitude of Edward VIII., elsewhere described (c), turned not on public business, but on a private issue, though one affecting public interests. Abdication, therefore, may fairly be ruled out as a legitimate instrument of the Crown. If the threat were made and failed, the King would either have to give way, which would seriously affect his dignity and future influence, or he would have to resign, with the resulting necessity of legislation to regulate the succession, a matter now involving serious dangers to the cohesion of the Commonwealth. In the long run the monarchy would probably suffer, even if in some cases the use of this weapon should prove successful.

(a) Letters, 2 s., iii. 646.

(b) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 28.

(c) See pp. 366, 367, ante.

The point has naturally been raised (d), whether the position of the King in respect to the Dominions might not enable him to put pressure on ministers, by pointing out to them that if he were driven to abdicate by their pressing undesired counsel upon him, there would be created a dangerous position, involving the maintenance of Imperial unity. But after the abdication of Edward VIII. the issue has probably lost any serious importance. Dominion autonomy is so complete, that it has to be admitted that British autonomy is in like case, and that ministers could not give up any essential policy in view of such a threat. Unimportant issues will always find them prepared to make concessions, as in the case of the rather interesting question of the contents of the royal speech from the throne.

The question of the constitutional right of Queen Victoria to have her own way on the speech from the throne was discussed with much warmth in 1881 (e), when it was decided by the ministry to withdraw from Kandahar, as part of the business of clearing up the muddle of Afghanistan. Sir W. Harcourt and Lord Spencer were present, and were in great difficulties, as the Queen was insistent on change, while Mr. Gladstone was equally firm in the other sense. At last the Queen gave way with infinitely bad grace, and the speech was approved in Council. The doctrine that the speech was really the speech of ministers was naturally impressed on the Queen; it had been recognised in 1710 by Swift, asserted by Wilkes in No. 45 of the North Briton, as perfectly well understood, and the same doctrine had been laid down by Lord Melbourne in reply to the Duke of Wellington in 1841. But Lord Beaconsfield laid down that no such principle was known to the British constitution that the speech should be approved in Council, and for that purpose should be submitted well in advance for the royal approval. Approval in Council was in fact normal at that time; it was only in 1921 that it was held that when in Scotland the royal approval (f) could be given by the sign manual simply in order to save the necessity of holding a formal Council, and that was due to special conditions. The point, of course, of the controversy was simple enough. The nature of the speech really makes it clear that it must represent the policy of the Government, and that it need not be wholly satisfactory to the Crown personally, so that the sovereign is recognised as being detached from its pronouncements in any personal way. But, on the other hand, the sovereign has clearly the right to object, so far as he thinks it worth while. In 1881, if the Queen had persisted, the ministry would have resigned, and that at the moment of the opening of Parliament would have been revolutionary. On the other hand are ministers usually willing to consider seriously any suggestion of change? Thus in 1864, the Queen secured the deletion of a paragraph in the royal speech on the score that it was needlessly bellicose in tone, and might precipitate a war with Germany. In 1893, Mr. Gladstone agreed to modify reference to a Bill for the better government of Ireland, to a Bill to amend the provision for the government of Ireland (g). In the speech for February, 1910 (h), some changes were made to meet royal criticisms, and deliberately, without suggestion from the King, the last paragraph was so worded by the insertion of the phrase, "in the opinion of my advisers," as to make it plain that the King was not being involved personally in the proposal to regulate the relations of the two Houses. On December 13th, 1921 (i), a grave inelegance of diction was duly detected and corrected, with the assent of the two ministers present, with the concurrence of a hereditary master of English in the person of Lord Lytton.

(d) Cf. Mr. Balfour's view, quoted November 19th, 1909, by Esher, Journals, ii. 421.

(e) Letters, 2 s., iii. 178 ff; Ponsonby, Sidelights on Queen Victoria, pp. 144 ff.; Gardiner, Harcourt, i. 397 ff.

At the close of 1902 (k) the speech was influenced by the (f) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 756 f.

(h) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 699 f.

(k) Fitzroy, Memoirs, i. 115.

(g) Guedalla, ii. 462.

(i) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 771.

desire of the King for the insertion of something in the nature of an eirenicon on the Education Act. The Lord Chancellor is then said to have asserted that he received two copies of the speech, one from the Prime Minister, one from the President of the Council, and that they very rarely agreed, but it mattered little, for the Press derived their information from a third, which generally differed from both !

Insistence on alteration of the speech at the prorogation of Parliament is interestingly attested in 1907 (l), when ministers at first desired the King to express regret at the failure of the Lords to pass the Bill for the creation of small holdings in Scotland. Edward VII. demurred to the "covered thrust" at the Lords thus implied, and also objected to an expression of regret, and in the ultimate issue the whole reference was deleted. This is a very clear case where a substantial concession was made to the royal wishes. On the other hand, in the speech on the opening of Parliament in 1894 (m) the reference to disestablishment of the churches in Wales and Scotland was modified at the last moment to meet the Queen's wishes. Apparently she had misunderstood what had been agreed upon with Mr. Gladstone before the retirement of the latter (n).

3. The Crown and the Dissolution of Parliament.

The prerogative of the Crown to dissolve Parliament is undoubtedly. The manner of dissolution does not, as often said, strictly speaking involve the aid of ministers, for the King could still present himself in the House of Lords, and by word of mouth, dissolve the Parliament. But in practice dissolution takes place by a proclamation under the great seal, which is based on the advice of the Privy Council, and which refers to an Order in Council requiring the issue of the writs for the meeting of Parliament. No ministry which did not wish to dissolve would give the necessary aid, and, therefore, a forced dissolution is impossible, though one induced by royal pressure is perfectly in order. But it must be remembered that a Government which dissolves must make a good case for dissolution, and, therefore, a ministry, which was itself not unwilling to meet a royal suggestion might be precluded from doing so by the consideration that it could not comply with this condition. Instances where ministries did not wish to dissolve, though royal sanction could have been had, have already been mentioned in 1866, 1873, 1885, 1895, and 1905.

(l) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 476 f.

(m) Letters, 3 s., ii. 378 ff.

(n) There was an interesting exchange of views regarding the speech of June 7th, 1859, between Lord Derby and the Queen: Letters, 1 s., iii. 336 ff.

An interesting point, however, arises (o). If a ministry dissolved at the request of the Crown—for example, Lord Rosebery in 1894—would it be in order for it to make it clear that it had done so for that reason? Sir H. James on November 5th, 1894, pointed out that the Prime Minister would be compelled to explain why his Government had departed from its earlier intention not to dissolve, and that the royal intervention would thus become known, and the election, instead of being a contest on the issue which the Queen desired to have decided, the position of the House of Lords, might turn on the view of the electorate, as to the treatment of the ministry by the Crown. Plausible at first sight, this seems to assume in the ministry an attitude which would clearly be improper. If the ministry deferred to her wishes, they must make them their own, and in that case they would act with serious impropriety if they allowed the argument as to their treatment to be raised in the constituencies, and they could destroy it at once, if raised independently, by saying that they took no exception whatever to the royal persuasion. In fact, no doubt the ministry would not ascribe the change of view solely, or mainly, to royal suggestion, and the occasion for criticism would not arise.

(o) Letters, 3 s., ii. 442—44.

If the Crown cannot, except by persuasion or dismissal of ministers, secure a dissolution, it is clearly not bound to grant a dissolution when asked for, provided that it can obtain other ministers to take responsibility for the royal refusal. This view was inevitable under the pre-reform constitution; in 1806 or 1807 the Crown could have refused a dissolution to Lord Grenville and the Duke of Portland without hesitation. In 1831 William IV. would have refused to dissolve if he could have secured a ministry to replace that of Earl Grey. Moreover, the view of Queen Victoria, shared by Lord Melbourne and Sir R. Peel, that a dissolution was a weapon in the hands of the Crown, to be used only in extreme cases, and with a certainty of success, since its use followed by defeat, "is a thing most lowering to the Crown, and hurtful to the country," assumed that the Crown preserved full discretion (p). When the question of the possibility of the Lords rejecting the great Bill to sweep away the Navigation Acts was mooted, Lord J. Russell doubted if the Queen, on sending for Lord Stanley, would be willing to give him a dissolution. In 1851 the resignation of Lord John Russell led to discussion between the Queen and Lord Stanley; Lord John thought that it would involve a responsibility too great for the Crown to refuse an appeal to the country for a new Government, though a decision ought to depend on the peculiar circumstances of the case. Lord Stanley pointed out to the Queen that he would have no chance of success in the Commons if it were thought that the Queen would withhold from him the privilege of dissolving, and the Queen went so far as to allow him to deny, if necessary, that the Queen would not consent to a dissolution, though she would not give any promise, however contingent (q).

The constitutional position was explained by Lord Aberdeen in 1858 in response to the royal enquiry, as to her attitude in the event of Lord Derby asking for a dissolution. His aim of course, was primarily to obtain permission to announce that, if defeated, he had royal sanction for a dissolution; this the Queen refused, as an unconstitutional use of her name and authority to coerce the Commons. Lord Aberdeen felt clear that, if asked, she would give a dissolution; it must be assumed that the minister thought it necessary for the good of the country. The Queen could refuse a dissolution—it was one of the very few acts which the Queen could do without responsible advice at the moment, but the new ministry must assume responsibility for the refusal, and defend it in Parliament. There was no precedent for refusal, which would mean the dismissal of Lord Derby, instead of his resignation from inability to carry on the Government. A new minister would have to give reasons why a dissolution was refused, and no considerations of public business, or the possible bad effect of frequent general elections, would be an effective ground, unless something could be made of the danger of discussing intemperately upon every hustings the proceedings of the Government regarding India.

(p) Letters, 1 s., ii. 91.

(q) Letters, 1 s., ii. 289 f., 303 f., 307 f.; see Lord Aberdeen and Sir J. Graham, 301. For the action of Lord Derby in stating he would advise a dissolution, ibid. 382 ff.

Lord Aberdeen's statement (r) has been criticised, but it is clearly sound sense. A ministry which asks for a dissolution will insist on resigning if it is refused; Lord John Russell and Mr. Disraeli made that clear in 1866 and 1868 alike. As Lord Salisbury said in 1886, to allow a dissolution is the natural and ordinary course, and would shield the Queen from any accusation of partisanship. It is difficult to understand the alleged (s) dissatisfaction of Edward VII. at Mr. Balfour's statement that the dissolution obtained by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman was dictated by the Cabinet, and that the House of Commons could force one. A new Cabinet in the circumstances of the case must have a dissolution, and the King knew that perfectly well. The statement that the King on November 16th, 1910 (t), refused a dissolution until he was given some proof that ministers were powerless in a Parliament of their own choosing, rests on an ignorant assertion of Sir A. Fitzroy, from whom Lord Morley, for whatever reason, had withheld the facts. We know now that the issue between the King and ministers was not that of dissolution, but of the giving of a pledge by the King to swamp the Lords if the dissolution resulted in victory for the party.

(r) Letters, 1 s., iii. 287.

(t) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 422 f.

(s) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 43 f.

In 1923, in view of the appearance of a three-party system, Mr. Asquith affirmed that the King would be at liberty to refuse a dissolution to Mr. MacDonald, if it were asked for (u). The assertion was based, no doubt, on the hope that, if that occurred, the King would turn to him to form a new ministry. It is a clear case of sound judgment being obscured by personal feelings, for any serious consideration should have shown that, when the occasion arose, the King would be under every conceivable obligation to allow the ministry to take the verdict of the country. It is clear that Mr. Asquith forgot that a dissolution is an appeal to the political sovereign, and that when it is asked for every consideration of constitutional propriety demands that it be conceded. In fact the King did concede it without hesitation to Mr. MacDonald, as had been clear, even to many of Mr. Asquith's sympathisers long before the event took place, and as no doubt he himself recognised in his gallant attempt to save the ministry from a defeat in the Campbell case, which would force it into resignation (x). It is, however, more than likely that, but for this inaccurate point of view, he would not have committed the fatal blunder of placing Labour in power without conditions, which unquestionably marked the beginning of the final debacle of the Liberal party.

It is, of course, true that the right to a dissolution is not a right to a series of dissolutions. The King could not, because a ministry had appealed and lost an election, give them forthwith another without seeming to be endeavouring to wear out the resistance of the electors to the royal will. The amazing suggestion of Mr. A. Chamberlain to the contrary (y), in 1910, has been noted above as one of the many signs of his immaturity of constitutional outlook. Herein the Crown might have to refuse, and so enforce the retirement of a ministry; indeed, the theory of automatic action by the Crown comes on this point disastrously to grief. But it must be remarked that it would, indeed, be an unwise ministry which asked at once for a fresh dissolution, for probably it would succeed in extinguishing itself.

(u) The Times, December 19th, 1923.

(x) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 342 ff.

How long must elapse before a ministry, returned with a small plurality, or dependent on aid from other groups at one election, can be given another dissolution, depends entirely on circumstances, and defies any attempt at definition. In Canada the plurality given to the Liberal party by the election of 1925 was too small to allow it to carry on effectively, and one reason for Lord Byng's refusal of a dissolution in 1926 was, no doubt, the fact that Mr. Mackenzie King had had so recently a dissolution without achieving full success, so that another was not proper. The crushing defeat of the new Government of Mr. Meighen in the election following on its advent to office was largely due to the raising of the constitutional issue of the right of the Governor-General to grant a dissolution, and no very exact conclusion can be drawn, except that in all the circumstances, the refusal of a dissolution to Mr. King was an unfortunate error of judgment, since an election was patently necessary to allow an effective ministry to be formed and, that being so, to refuse it to the Premier, and then to give it to his successor, looked like political partisanship (z), though, in fact, it was not.

The right to advise a dissolution was long assumed to belong to the Cabinet, and for this view there is abundant precedent from 1841, when Lord Melbourne's decision to dissolve was due to the Cabinet, which vetoed his desire to resign, based on his doubt whether the result would not be a rebuff for the Crown. In 1868 Mr. Disraeli was criticised for asking for a dissolution without calling a formal Cabinet meeting; the answer was that ten days before the Cabinet had assented to a policy of dissolution, so that the Premier could assume he had the right to act, and, in fact, his request was approved next day by the Cabinet (a). Mr. Gladstone was so far from dissolving without consulting the Cabinet that on January 21st, 1874, he informed the Queen that he would recommend that the Cabinet should advise dissolution, and Lord Granville simultaneously urged the Queen to view the idea favourably; the Cabinet on January 23rd took the step unanimously. The Premier had consulted only Lord Granville, Mr. Goschen, and Mr. Cardwell, whose objections, as heads of the navy and army departments, to Mr. Gladstone's requests for reduction of expenditure in his capacity of Chancellor of the Exchequer, had rendered matters in the Cabinet decidedly difficult (b). In 1895 the Cabinet debated resignation or dissolution, and the accord of Lord Rosebery and Sir W. Harcourt was sufficiently amazing to carry the day. In 1900 dissolution was long discussed before Lord Salisbury gave way. In 1905 Mr. Balfour's position is somewhat obscure, but not on this point; Mr. Wyndham (c), indeed, asserted that it lay alone with him to advise a dissolution, but Mr. Balfour did not in the slightest agree, and in his final decision to resign, he was acting with the Cabinet, which had discussed, as in 1895, dissolution or resignation (d). His view on dissolution, which annoyed the King in some degree, was that it was in the power of the Commons to decide that it was necessary, no doubt by ceasing to support the ministry effectively; the King evidently ascribed a greater measure of autonomy to his advisers, and to himself, as against the Commons. In 1906, and in 1910, the Cabinet discussed and decided.

(y) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 259, 264.

(z) Keith, Responsible Government in the Dominions, i. 146—52.

(a) Malmesbury, Memoirs, p. 639.

(b) Letters, 2 s., ii. 304—6.

(c) Mackail and Wyndham, Life, ii. 505.

(d) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 188—91; Esher, Journals, ii. 118—21,

For later dates there is no direct authority, save the statements regarding what happened in 1935 (e), when Sir J. Simon said that "the decision, whether there shall be an immediate general election and, if so, on what date the country shall go to the polls, rests with the Prime Minister, and until the Prime Minister has decided, all anticipations are without authority." The wording of this assertion is not free from ambiguity; it is compatible with the view that the principle of dissolution had been discussed in Cabinet, but the details left to the Prime Minister. Mr. Baldwin himself certainly, in justifying the choice of date, spoke in the Commons as if he had decided the matter, but he did not actually announce any constitutional principle in clear terms. We, therefore, do not actually know to what extent, if any, Cabinet discussion did take place. But Mr. Baldwin (f) undoubtedly tended to magnify his office, and in his first dealings with Edward VIII. on the abdication issue, he did not take any member of the Cabinet into his confidence. It is suggested (g) also that his decision to dissolve in 1923 on the issue of Protection was taken without consultation with his Cabinet. If this is so, it is not easy to say that the precedents he set were advantageous. The other members of a Cabinet are often not much inferior in ability or popularity in the party to the Prime Minister, and to assume the right to dictate might prove dangerous in other cases. Sir J. Simon's position, of course, was precarious, for he was not a Conservative, but a Liberal National, dependent on his chance of re-election on the favour of the Prime Minister. How far the Cabinet acted in the Labour decisions of 1924, or in those of the coalition in 1918 and in 1931, is not recorded, but is very probable for 1924 and 1931 (h), and the decision of (e) The Times, October 18th, 1935. One must not take too seriously such an assertion. For 1924, see Clynes, Memoirs, ii. 63.

(f) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 41—47.

(g) W. I. Jennings, Cabinet Government, p. 313. But Mallet, Cave, p. 264, is no proof. For 1918 cf. Taylor, Bonar Law, pp. 239 ff.

(h) The first Cabinet must really have acted as a unit. Mr. N. Chamberlain's language of April 4th, 1938, is not decisive even of his view, 1918 was, no doubt, by the War Cabinet, as desired by its leaders.

There is every reason that the Cabinet should be consulted and decide such an issue, and the fact that the older practice has been departed from, to some degree, is no ground that further departure should take place. It is derogatory to the dignity of other Cabinet ministers, and tends to make them appear in the public eye the servants, rather than the equals, of the Prime Minister. It runs counter to the best aspects of the constitution, the doctrine of collective responsibility and deliberation, and it presumes that for some reason or other, in this vital issue, the Prime Minister has a pre-eminence in other issues denied to him. In the Dominions the doctrine is not accepted. The Prime Minister (i) naturally has the initiative in proposing a dissolution, but the recommendation goes forth from the Cabinet, and in New South Wales the Governor very properly refused to dissolve on the advice of Mr. Lang, not homologated by Cabinet, adopting in lieu the perfectly constitutional procedure of accepting the Premier's resignation, and then appointing him head of a new ministry which would advise dissolution. Dominion practice and early British practice seem sounder than the arrogation to himself of authority by a single mind, not necessarily of outstanding capacity as compared with those of his colleagues.

4. The Cabinet, the Crown, and the House of Lords.

The Cabinet, as we have seen, is dependent solely on the favour of the Commons, and, except when a Conservative Cabinet is in office, it is certain that its policy will find a measure of opposition in the Lords. Criticism and amendment in detail of Governmental measures it is unreasonable to resent, but, as the Upper Chamber has necessarily a strong leaning to Conservatism—whether for good or evil—conflict between it and the Commons is in the nature of things. The one power which the Cabinet possessed, until 1911, to constrain the Lords to accept proposals of the Commons, was the plainly delicate power to add members to the Lords to swamp their resistance. Such swamping has occurred often enough in the Dominions in constitutions permitting thereof, by having nominee Upper Houses without any limitation of numbers (k). These bodies tend inevitably to disappear under the operation of this process, as in Queensland in 1922, while the House of New South Wales was only rescued from destruction by being placed on a new basis. But to swamping in this way the Lords has always presented a grave obstacle in its hereditary character, no less than in its vast prestige derived from its great strength in past history, and from the wealth and social standing of its members. No doubt the Reform Act of 1832 secured the primacy of the Commons, but it was very long before that primacy was not liable to be thwarted by the resistance of the Upper Chamber.

(i) Keith, The Dominions as Sovereign States, p. 355.

The power of the Crown over the House of Lords, considerable under the Tudors in view of the disappearance of so many ancient names in the Wars of the Roses, had gradually lessened through new creations, and the right of the Crown to withhold a summons was successfully remonstrated against as early as 1626 in the case of the Earl of Bristol (l). In the case of the Treaty of Utrecht in 1712 the peers showed sufficient hostility to acceptance of the surrender to a scion of the house of Bourbon of Spain and the West Indies, that twelve peers were hastily added to carry the day (m). The precedent passed without special notice, but, when in 1830 reform became urgently necessary, the situation had changed (n). The first Reform Bill introduced in March, 1831, passed second reading by one vote only, and in committee was amended on a vital point; a dissolution

(k) Keith, The Dominions as Sovereign States, p. 250.

(l) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), p. 69.

(m) Ridges, op. cit., p. 93.

(n) See Grey, Correspondence with William IV. and Sir Herbert Taylor, ii., especially 96 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, i., 319.

followed on April 22, and the second Bill passed in September, to be rejected by the Lords on October 8th. The ministry, on receiving promise of royal support, passed another Bill through second reading on December 12th, and in order to secure its acceptance by the hostile Lords on January 13th, 1832, advised the creation of peers so soon as it was evident that thus only could the measure be passed. The King gave a rather grudging assent, but his reply to the Cabinet's recommendation on March 27th that, if the peers rejected the Bill, a prorogation and creation of peers should follow, was not a categorical undertaking. On April 14 the Bill received a majority of nine on second reading, but was amended on May 7th to postpone consideration of the vital disfranchising clauses. The Cabinet then asked for creation of peers, but without success for the moment, though reinforced by an address to the Crown from the Commons passed by a majority of eighty on their resignation, asking the King to call to his Council those who would secure the passage of the Bill. An effort was made by the King to induce Lord Lyndhurst and the Duke of Wellington to take office in a ministry formed to support moderate but extensive reforms. Sir R. Peel held back and the Duke abandoned the commission on May 15th; the King yielded, but sought to secure by appeal on May 17th to the Duke and others the declaration of the dropping of their opposition. The Cabinet, however, demanded indisputable security, and obtained it verbally and in writing on May 18th, the King now giving a promise to create an unlimited number, though so far as possible the addition was to be made up of the eldest sons of peers and collateral heirs of childless peers, so as to reduce any permanent addition to the peerage. It was, no doubt, this promise which was made public through Sir H. Taylor, the King's Secretary, which secured the third reading on June 4th. It is quite unfair to pay any attention to Lord Brougham's (o) doubts of twelve years later as to whether the King would have created peers, if his appeals to them not to resist had proved ineffective; a King is entitled to be credited with good faith, and the whole procedure shows the sovereign being gradually and reluctantly, but ineluctably drawn towards the logical solution. Whether Lord Esher (p) thought so or not, and his wide knowledge of constitutional episodes was not equalled by his judgment thereon, the precedent was clear.

(o) Pol. Philosophy, iii. 308.

The conclusion to be drawn from this case was not very far-reaching. It established only that the prerogative to add members might be invoked where the Commons had a clear mandate, as shown by a general election, and where government could not be carried on in the face of the view of the Commons. The position, however, of the Commons was strengthened by Mr. Gladstone's success in establishing the supremacy of the Commons in finance by his action in respect of the claim of the Lords to refuse permission for the abolition of the duty on paper in 1860; by including in one measure the whole proposals of the Government next year, he presented the Lords with the alternative of rejecting the whole financial provisions or acquiescing in his project (q). In other matters the Lords, as in the case of the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, were accustomed to accept the clear voice of the electorate. The controversy over the franchise and redistribution in 1884—85 was animated, but accommodated fairly enough by securing that both steps were duly taken so as to coincide in effect. In 1906, however, a new note appeared in the Lords, whose ranks had been swollen by former Liberal peers who had deserted that cause on the Irish issue, or from dissatisfaction with the death duties of 1894. These aggressive industrialists were not willing to acquiesce in the primacy of the Commons, and Lord Lansdowne asserted the claim that the Lords should arrest the progress of measures which they believed to have been insufficiently considered or not to represent the considered judgment of the country. This was a dangerous claim, because it was so indeterminate, for the system of general elections is not such as to give any mandate which cannot be attacked either, because so many issues were combined, or that the electors really voted for men not measures, or that the number of seats gained, and of votes cast, is disproportionate, or that the majority included non-homogeneous elements. At any rate the rejection of the Bills for education and plural voting in 1906 elicited the determination of the Government that the powers of the Lords should be so restricted that the will of the Commons should prevail in the period of one Parliament. Steps to this end were forced on the ministry in 1909, when the Finance Bill (r) was rejected by 350 votes to 75, an act denounced by the Premier on December 2nd as unconstitutional. It is stated (s) that the Government for a time contemplated action in the form of advising the King to place in the hands of the Prime Minister the right to create peers, or, in the alternative, of a Bill accompanied by an intimation that the Crown would create peers to secure its passing if opposed. Lord Esher regarded the idea placed before him by Lord Haldane as inadmissible, and Mr. Balfour insisted that there could be no justification for the King giving a promise to secure the passing of a Bill not so far submitted to the Commons, while he was prepared to take office if the ministry resigned on the refusal of so unjust a request (t). Lord Knollys (u), after a dissolution had been granted without any arrangement, informed Mr. Asquith that the King had come to the conclusion that he would not be justified in creating new peers (say 300) until after a second general election, and that the country should be informed of the project, which would amount to the destruction of the Lords, before such an election.

(p) Influence of King Edward, p. 78; Journals, ii. 424.

(q) Bell. Palmerston, ii. 260 ff., 283 ff.; Morley. ii. 29 ff.

(r) For admission of the folly of these tactics see Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 375—83.

(s) Esher, Journals, ii. 423—5 (December 1st, 1909).

(t) Cf. his attitude in April, 1910; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 242 f.

(u) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 261.

The ministry on February 11th, 1910 (x), formally assured the Crown that they did not “propose to advise or request any exercise of the royal prerogative in existing circumstances, or until they have submitted their plan to Parliament. If, in their judgment, it should become their duty to tender such advice, they would do so when—and not before—the actual necessity may arise.” On February 21st Mr. Asquith reiterated this position in the Commons, and on April 14th, on the first reading of the Parliament Bill (y), made it clear that, if the Bill were not passed, the Government would resign, or advise a dissolution, but “in no case will we recommend a dissolution except under such conditions as will secure that in the new Parliament the judgment of the people, as expressed at the elections, will be carried into law.” Reference has been made above (z) to the Lambeth Palace meeting of April 27th, when Mr. Balfour indicated his attitude, but the death of the King on May 6th ended this phase.

The possibility of compromise was afforded thus, and a conference met on June 17th and expired on November 10th (a), largely because the Conservatives proved too exigent in their demands, which plainly were based on their essential desire to safeguard themselves from the passing of a Home Rule Bill, as the Government had at the last election rid itself of the limitation of action announced in 1906. On November 11th Mr. Asquith pointed out to the King that the Cabinet had decided on recommending an immediate dissolution, and that it was necessary that, in the event of the Government obtaining an adequate majority in the new House of Commons, the matter should be put in train for settlement. The withholding of summonses to peers would probably be unconstitutional, the creation of peers was (x) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 273.

(y) The King commented on the draft Bill being dated April 1st.

(z) See p. 373, ante.

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 285—91; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 290, 295 ff.

indisputably constitutional, and the knowledge that the Crown would use the prerogative would be sufficient to bring about acceptance. On November 15th the Cabinet formally advised a dissolution, but only on the understanding that "in the event of the policy of the Government being approved by an adequate majority in the new House of Commons, His Majesty will be ready to exercise his constitutional powers (which may involve the prerogative of creating peers) if needed to secure that effect shall be given to the decision of the country" (b). It was added that the King would "doubtless agree that it would be inadvisable in the interest of the State that any communication of the intentions of the Crown should be made public, unless and until the actual occasion should arise." The advice was repeated by Mr. Asquith and Lord Crewe personally on November 16th, and accepted by the King on the understanding that the Parliament Bill would be submitted to the Lords before the election, which was duly done before the dissolution (c).

This silence was remarkable and very inconvenient, as was proved, when on January 27th, 1911, the King saw, with the reluctant consent of Mr. Asquith, Lord Lansdowne (d). Lord Lansdowne explained the position of the party in vague terms, but agreed that for Mr. Balfour to win an election would be very difficult at the time. It is not clear what purpose this interview served, but probably the King hoped that, in view of the reluctance he would feel to creating peers, and to the plain fact that, if asked, he could have no alternative, Lord Lansdowne might secure the acceptance of the Governmental proposals, or something near enough to alter the position for him vitally. If so, his hope was not fulfilled. The Lords in Committee from June 28th to July 14th so altered the Bill that on the latter date the Cabinet, denying the possibility of a third dissolution, advised

(b) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 296 f.

(c) Newton, Lansdowne, p. 410; Halévy, Hist., 1905—15, pp. 332 ff.

(d) Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 409 ff. Balfour's views on December 27th are given, pp. 407 f.

the exercise of the prerogative without doubt that the sovereign would feel it to be his constitutional duty to accept their advice. The royal assent was given on July 17th. The fact was communicated on July 18th by Mr. Lloyd George to Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne, and formally on July 20th, immediately after the third reading of the Bill, by Mr. Asquith (e), who insisted that he, as responsible, not the King, should act. Next day it was considered by a meeting of Unionist peers, and Lord Lansdowne saw the King on July 24th, learning his anxiety, and that of the Government, to limit the creation. On that date Mr. Asquith was stupidly shouted down when he attempted to state the position in the Commons on the consideration of the amendments from that House. On August 7th a vote of censure was moved in the Commons on the unconstitutional advice given to the King, Mr. Balfour suggesting that advantage had been taken of the King's lack of personal experience, while Mr. Asquith insisted on the absolute correctness of his action. On August 8th, on a like vote in the Lords, Lord Crewe, with royal sanction, explained the interview of November 16th, 1910, but further than that he felt it unwise to do. The King's reluctance had been explained, and the fact that he had no alternative but to accept or dismiss ministers, when an election would have been fought against him personally, was plain. In the Lords, when the Bill was sent back with only one slight change accepted, Lord Morley had the thrill of his life in reading with royal sanction the words: "if the Bill should be defeated to-night His Majesty will assent to the creation of peers sufficient in numbers to guard against any possible combination of the different parties in opposition, by which the Parliament Bill might be exposed a second time to defeat." The result was that 131 peers gave assent to 117 negatives. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Rosebery, and Lord Curzon helped the victory, as did the Archbishop of York and eleven bishops, while Lord Lansdowne abstained. Some peers voted simply to prevent the creation of rivals. Lord Halsbury and others showed reckless disregard of the unwisdom of resistance (f).

(e) Spender, op cit., ii. 310; Newton, op. cit., pp. 417 ff.

The measure (g) thus passed puts complete power over a money Bill so certified by the Speaker, whose decision cannot be questioned in any Court, in the hands of the Commons, though the Lords must have it before them for a month before the end of the session. Other Bills, except a Bill to extend the duration of Parliament, or to confirm a provisional order, may be passed over the head of the Lords if passed for three consecutive sessions in one or more Parliaments and not accepted, either without amendments or with amendments accepted by the Commons, in each session, the Bill having been sent up at least a month before the end of the session. Two years, at least, must elapse between the second reading in the first session and the date of passing in the third session. The rule is confined to public Bills, but the Commons has full power to decide what shall be passed as a public Bill.

Can the royal prerogative be invoked since the Act to overcome resistance when it is not desired to wait two years for assent ? (g). Sir S. Cripps and other Labour leaders have no doubt that it can be used, and that it would be necessary to use it to secure the effective working of their plans for immediate socialisation. The position is difficult, because the provision of a deadlock procedure normally means that constitutionally it should be resorted to, and it must be remembered that the powers of constitutional change under procedure of the Act are almost unlimited, so that there is no excuse that long delay would be occasioned, even on a proposal to abolish the House itself. No doubt, if the ministry has a very clear mandate for immediate action, the King might have to yield, for in that case to force a dissolution would be unwise in the interests of the Crown as suggesting, not desire to preserve the constitution, but prejudice against Labour. If, however, the mandate were less clear, it would certainly be constitutional to urge strongly procedure by the appointed process, and a Government might well accept, rather than face a hotly contested election fought over action, which would in any case be rather abnormal.

(f) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 457—61; cf. Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 312 ff.; Fox, Halsbury, pp. 231 ff.

(g) 1 & 2 Geo. V. c. 13. A. Chamberlain's resistance (Politics from Inside, pp. 318 f., 348 ff.) was very unreasoning, and no doubt told against his claim to leadership as against Bonar Law; Taylor, pp. 143—9.

It must be remembered that, while the King cannot ultimately defy the electorate, he has a limited power of delaying action. A minority Government might be created if a majority denied its request for swamping of the Upper House resigned, and, if the Appropriation Act had been already passed, it might carry on for a time, for the Act gives power to spend, and supplementary sums might be taken from the civil contingencies fund, or borrowed under the terms of the Act. For the rest, the risk might be taken of seeking to borrow more money, but it must be remembered that the assent to expenditure of the Comptroller and Auditor-General is requisite, and he might raise insuperable difficulties (h). If the Finance Act had been passed, then revenue would be available, but not if that were not the case, for the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, 1913, permits only levying under resolutions for a fixed time (i). If the Army and Air Force (Annual) Act had not been passed, the effort of a minority Government to carry on could be destroyed forthwith. On the whole the financial difficulties may be exaggerated, but they are very serious, and a minority Government would probably have at once to make it clear that it merely proposed to carry on for a brief period in order to allow the country quiet reflection and time to recover from the excitement and strain of a general election.

(h) Cf. Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 258 f. In 1909—10 the Government carried on without a Finance Act; cf. ibid. p. 218.

(i) Four months from the date of the resolution; 3 Geo. V. c. 3. The Act was due to Bowles v. Bank of England, [1913] 1 Ch. 57. For the solution of the financial difficulties of the rejection of the Finance Bill in 1909, see Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 275 n. 1.

An issue of very substantial importance is suggested by the question of the secrecy observed and maintained successfully regarding the King's promise of November 16th, 1910. Lord Morley preserved it, even in his discussion of December 12th with Sir A. Fitzroy (k), and there is no doubt, that the opposition leaders found it hard to believe that it had been given when the fact was revealed to them. It may be held that the procedure was justified on the score that it obviated bringing the position of the King under party attack during the election of 1910. But this appears to be a very unconvincing argument, hardly to be taken seriously. Candour would seem to have required that the country should have been told quite frankly of the pledge, so that the electors could have cast their votes knowing what the result would be. It must be assumed that the Government, in urging secrecy, thought that this course of action would be of advantage to them; that is, their attitude was merely tactical. It is impossible to see how the position of the King could have been attacked during the election if the fact of the pledge had been known. It would have been clear that the King was taking the perfectly proper course of leaving the people a definite decision to make in full knowledge of what they were doing. The earlier declarations of the Government, it is arguable, should have been taken as making it clear that they were assured that the King would act as they desired in the event of success at the election, but the matter should have been candidly stated. It may be hoped that in any future instance secrecy will not be practised. Though ministers are, of course, responsible for it, it must involve the King in some measure of discredit among those who feel that in such a matter he is entitled to ask, and to insist, that no mystery be made regarding his line of action.

A further point regarding the relations of the ministry and the Lords was raised in the controversy over the Home Rule (k) Memoirs, ii. 427. Cf. Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, ii. 63.

Bill of 1912—14. An idea was suggested (l) in March, 1914, that the peers should reject the Army Annual Bill, thus depriving the Government of any power to use the forces to coerce Ireland. Fortunately Mr. Asquith was able to secure the bringing of influence to bear to prevent the scheme developing into action; it may legitimately be supposed that the King intimated that he could not approve a step which would have rendered the existence of the whole of the army illegal in the face of the growing dangers in Europe. The episode is, however, worthy of record, because it shows to what a pitch party feeling could be carried. The folly of the attitude then adopted can be realised when it is remembered that in April, 1938, Mr. N. Chamberlain effectively intervened (m) to provide for the unconditional surrender of the last vestige of royal authority in Eire, and gave Mr. de Valera the right to proclaim the complete sovereign independence of that country. It was not unfitting that the son should be the instrument to undo the injury inflicted by his father's opposition, even to the modest measure of self-government proposed by Mr. Gladstone. How far the resistance of the opposition in 1914 rendered greater the likelihood of Germany going to war in August will never be determined, but that it had some effect is unquestionable.

5. The Participation of the King in the Formation of Policy and in Government.

(a) The King's Relations to the Cabinet.

The Cabinet, as we have seen, is a body whose duty it is to decide on policy, which is then carried out by other branches of the Government. Its decisions must have the approval, express or tacit, of the King, and not only are the minutes of the Cabinet promptly supplied to him, but it is the duty of the Prime Minister to keep him fully informed of all major matters. The trouble, of course, is to decide what matters are major and at what stage the sovereign should be informed.

(l) Mr. A. Chamberlain shares responsibility for this most dangerous suggestion; Politics from Inside, pp. 609, 619—21.

(m) So stated by Mr. de Valera, April 27th, 1938. In the June election, 1938, the Deputy Leader claimed that his chief had once more whipped the English, but his chief made no such claim. The election gave him a sweeping majority (77 votes).

Prior to the creation of the Cabinet secretariat, the Prime Minister was wont to write a note of the decisions of the Cabinet in his own hand. The date when the practice began is not recorded, but no doubt it must practically have been contemporaneous with the cessation under George I. of the practice of the sovereign presiding over the deliberations of the Cabinet. Edward VII. was by no means prepared to excuse slackness in this report; he reminded Mr. Balfour that it should be of the old type, four sides of a quarto sheet (n); it may be surmised that towards the end Lord Salisbury was briefer than desirable. Under Queen Victoria, not only did the Prime Ministers report on Cabinet decisions, but, beginning with Sir R. Peel, each night of Parliament they sent a summary of what had happened in Parliament (o); some examples are found in the Letters. Edward VII. (p) relaxed the rule; he permitted the Home Secretary to report, and did not demand that it be sent the same evening. George V. allowed the practice to lapse: when the Debates were delayed, as under the Queen, the value of the letter might be asserted; though the Press gave full information, it might be biased; under modern conditions of rapid publication of the Debates, the letter is no doubt less valuable. It is characteristic of Mr. Gladstone that only in his last ministry did he delegate the work with royal assent to Sir W. Harcourt, who was less persona ingrata to the Queen than he (q).

The Cabinet is in policy a unity, after discussion, but no one doubts that there are divergent views, and these are often allowed to leak out by accident or design. It was

(n) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 47.

(o) Letters, 1 s., i. 322.

(p) Lee, ii. 47; for Mr. Churchill's Disraelian touch, see p. 697 n. 3.

(q) See, e.g., Letters, 3 s., ii. 222, 224. For the publication of the Debates, see H. D. Jordan, Economica, xi. 437—48.

obvious in 1938, before Mr. Eden's resignation, that the Press were not badly informed of the trend of Cabinet feeling, however wrong in theory this must be. But how far should the Prime Minister go in revealing the secrets of Cabinet divisions to the sovereign. It is clearly arguable, as Mr. Gladstone held (r), that the Prime Minister should in his dealings with the sovereign adopt, with complete loyalty, the decisions of the Cabinet; he should not attempt to counteract the work of his colleagues, to increase his share of royal favour at their expense, or to pursue aims not shared by them. But it must be admitted that this is a counsel of perfection, which has been more often ignored than adhered to. Presumably it is felt that, as no one doubts that there are Cabinet differences, and newspapers refer to them with more or less imaginative detail, it is better for the sovereign to be frankly informed. Nor are there lacking cases where the Prime Minister seems to have invoked the influence of the sovereign to secure from his colleagues acceptance of his views of policy.

There is, of course, no doubt that before 1832 the sovereign was freely informed of dissensions, and we find George IV. deliberately asking Lord Liverpool, in view of Mr. Canning's recognition of the South American republics, for the individual views of the members of Cabinet, whether or not certain principles of policy were to be abandoned. The reply, however, was not in the form desired, for it was given generally and collectively, stating that there had been differences, but there was unanimity that the action taken did not conflict with the principles in question (s). Under William IV. the Cabinet minute as to creation of peers on which the King was unwilling to act included a dissent by the Duke of Richmond, and later difficulty arose when Lord Grey resumed power, because the King had shown it to the Duke of Wellington when asking him to form a Government (t). Lord Melbourne, as might be expected, told the Queen freely of differences of opinion. Thus in 1837 he notes Lord Howick's wise desire for conciliation, as well as repression, in Canada, and in 1839 his probably just strictures on the civil administration of the army (u), while in 1840 the Cabinet decision on Egypt was accompanied by minutes dissenting therefrom by Lords Clarendon and Holland (x). On the other hand, despite Prince Albert's desire that the practice of William IV. should be renewed, and the Queen be made aware of the course of argument in the Cabinet, ignorance of which he deemed a great weakness of the Crown, Sir R. Peel was reticent, even as to the dissent in 1845 (y), as to the Corn Laws, which led to the attempt to form a new ministry.

(r) Gleanings of Past Years, i. 74 f., 243.

(s) Stapylton, Canning, pp. 418—20.

(t) Correspondence with William IV., ii. 395, 424, 431.

Lord Stanley naturally explained his views for dissent, and Sir R. Peel explained the extent of the dissent when he had resumed office. Lord John Russell was also in favour of reticence.

But naturally enough under the régime of Lord Aberdeen, which was a coalition, there was free disclosure of divisions, not only by the Prime Minister (z), but by Lord John Russell (a) and Sir James Graham (b). On the contrary Lord Palmerston insisted that the Cabinet was always mentioned by him as an aggregate body (c). Yet in 1865 we find him explaining to the Queen Mr. Gladstone's objections to military and naval expenditure (d), but he and Mr. Gladstone often had difficulties, such as that already mentioned over the Paper Duties Bill, which his chief encouraged the Lords to reject (e). On the other hand, the Queen had in Lord Granville (f) a source of information, and received with satisfaction his advice to insist that the foreign policy of the Prime Minister and Lord

(u) Letters, 1 s., i. 98, 100, 147.

(x) Maxwell, Clarendon, i. 193 ff.; Bell, Palmerston, i. 301.

(y) Letters, 1 s., ii. 53 ff.; Parker, iii. 234 ff., 496 ff.

(z) Letters, 1 s., ii. 414, 450 f., 458 f.; iii. 57 ff.

(a) Letters, 1 s., iii. 21, 23. (b) Letters, 1 s., ii. 454 f.

(c) Guedalla, Gladstone and Palmerston, pp. 258 f.

(d) Letters, 2 s., i. 248.

(e) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 280 ff.

(f) Fitzmaurice, i. 349 ff., 469 ff.; ii. 123,

Russell should be submitted to the whole Cabinet (g). This emphasises the essential principle that it is the right of the sovereign to insist that she be advised by the Cabinet. Lord Granville again provided in 1868—74 the information which Mr. Gladstone deliberately withheld; we know from him that the Cabinet overruled Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Cardwell when they felt inclined to drop the Bill for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, despairing of the sudden conversion of the Lords, which was finally secured. Mr. Disraeli throughout his career was eager to inform the Crown, undoubtedly thereby adding to his authority in a high degree. Most important of all was his action in the Russo-Turkish discussions of 1877—78 in inducing the Queen, who no doubt fully shared his views, and may in part have inspired them—the interaction of their minds cannot definitely be cleared up—to put pressure on the Cabinet to accept a very strong line of pro-Turkish policy. Lord Derby resigned and Lord Carnarvon is authority for the fact that at this time the Queen saw ministers personally and dictated her ideas of policy (h).

The issue was definitely raised by the Queen in 1880 when, basing her request on newspaper assertions of dissensions, she demanded information from Lord Granville, if he could not induce the Premier to tell her. Mr. Gladstone's views did not change, and in 1885 she tried to reinforce her claim by allusions to the precedent of Sir R. Peel and Lord J. Russell, as well as Lords Melbourne and Beaconsfield; so far as can be seen, the argument as regards the two former is untenable. Mr. Gladstone gave her some information as to views on the Irish issue (i), but he never in any degree satisfied her. In his last ministry the Queen obtained some information from Lord Rosebery (k), especially as regards the strength of the British forces in Egypt, on which he had the backing of Mr. Bryce, but he insisted on the fair attitude of Sir W. Harcourt.

(g) Letters, 2 s., i. 66 ff. (Poland); 180 ff. (Denmark).

(h) Guedalla, ii. 352.

(i) Letters, 2 s., iii. 652 ff.
(k) Letters, 3 s., ii. 211; she had appealed to him in 1885; see Letters, 2 s., iii. 640. She appealed also to Lord Granville, 642 ff.

He also invoked and received her aid in pressing his policy in that matter. Mr. Gladstone, no doubt, knew in 1892 of Lord Rosebery's strong objection on the issue of Uganda to the trend of the view of the Cabinet, as being likely to be known to the Queen, when he alluded to it in one of his rare revelations of divergence of view in the Cabinet (l), and he refrained from any statements of differences of opinion on the Home Rule Bill of 1893 (m). Lord Rosebery, as Prime Minister, does not seem to have given much information, but he did defend himself in his desire to reform the Lords by reference to the fact that half the Cabinet favoured a single Chamber only (n). Lord Salisbury again reverted to the tradition of Lord Beaconsfield, at least, in his later days (o). He had in 1885 concealed successfully from the Queen the strange dealings of certain members of the Government with the Irish Nationalists in their efforts to obtain Home Rule from the Conservative party.

Under Edward VII. Mr. Asquith does not seem to have been anxious to be reticent in this topic. On February 2nd, 1909 (p), he informed the King of disagreement, but when the latter thought that there had been further discussions of which he had not been informed, he was assured that this was not the case, and full details were given when the Cabinet deliberated and the issue of four, six or eight Dreadnoughts divided the ministry. He did not, however, mention to the King, it seems, Lord Morley's doubts (q) on the issue of the Parliament Bill, which was too radical for that peer's Whig mind. He informed the King of the expected resignations in the Cabinet on the war issue, as soon as they became sufficiently mature (r). He seems also to have kept the King informed of all important dissensions in the War Cabinet (s); apparently (l) Letters, 3 s., i. 58 ff., 78. (m) Letters, 3 s., ii. 363, 364, 367.

(n) Cf. his explanation of Sir W. Harcourt's hostility; Letters, 3 s., ii. 398—400.

(o) E.g., Letters, 3 s., i. 10, 201 f., 211, 229.

(p) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 678 f.

(q) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 422.

(r) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 81 ff.

(s) Ibid. ii. 131.

the Retaliation Order in Council of March, 1915, resulted in acceptance by the Prime Minister, Sir E. Grey and Lord Crewe of the views of the majority, headed by Mr. Churchill, but the administration of the Order was much restrained in order to prevent acerbation of feeling in the United States. He also reported the meeting of the Cabinet of June 27th, 1916 (t), when an effort was made, despite most remarkable divergences of view, to secure accord on Ireland, an attempt fated to be a failure after an apparent success. Under the new scheme of Cabinet minutes the record shows the divergent arguments adduced, but not the names of those who adduce them. It remains, no doubt, for the Prime Minister, in his dealings with the Crown, to reveal as he may think fit how voices went.

The desire of the sovereign to know of divisions of opinion is quite natural, for it increases his power over the Prime Minister and the Cabinet alike. Yet there are plainly disadvantages. There is the risk of the sovereign becoming a partisan, and definitely taking sides, more probably with the Prime Minister, but possibly with the minority of ministers, which must render relations with the Prime Minister strained. It is rather unfair to dissentient ministers to have the fact brought before the Crown, for it may be prejudiced by representations made ex parte. But the case of the Queen's attitude to Lord Randolph Churchill in 1885 was really determined by the latter's speech in the Commons, and the Premier was quite generous in his defence of his attack on Lord Spencer's Irish administration, insisting that Lord Randolph was only adhering to an attitude expressed while in opposition, and was not bound by Parliamentary practice to alter in office an opinion relative to the merits, or otherwise, of past policy (u). But it does not seem doubtful that the report by Lord Salisbury of opposition in Cabinet to the efforts of the Queen to obtain restoration to power of Prince (t) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 218 ff.

 (u) Letters, 2 s., iii, 688 f.

Alexander of Bulgaria caused the Queen irritation against the malcontents. It appeared, however, that behind the difficulty in this case there loomed one much greater, the question of maintaining the traditional British policy of hostility to Russian advance in South-East Europe. Mr. Smith, Lord George Hamilton, and Lord R. Churchill were hostile, on the score that it was a futile policy, while Lord Salisbury, who shared the majority view, admitted that the actions of the Turkish Government made efforts to aid it very difficult (x). It is amusing to find that the Queen was anxious to prevent Foreign Office business being brought before the Cabinet at this time. That was clearly unsound, even if Lord Salisbury could not say so, since he had advised that Lord Rosebery should act in this sense (y).

It is clear that it is better for the Cabinet to act as a unity, but equally clear that it is impossible to prevent individual members revealing their views to the sovereign. The sovereign must obviously not conceal that this has been done from the Premier; this was admitted by William IV. when Lord Melbourne in 1834 protested against a communication by Lord John Russell, and is based on unanswerable considerations (z). But, if the Prime Minister cares to reveal differences of view, he can ask the sovereign to aid in smoothing them out. In October, 1840, the Queen wrote to Lord Palmerston, obviously on Lord Melbourne's inspiration, endeavouring to bring him into a more moderate spirit on the issue of relations with France (a). But more important was her skill in inducing General Peel to remain in Lord Derby's Government in 1867, when desirous of resigning over reform (b).

Edward VII.'s efforts were chiefly directed to endeavouring to induce members of the Cabinet to avoid undue violence of speech, and he resented deeply the vehemence of Mr. Lloyd

(x) Letters, 3 s., i. 202.

(y) Letters, 3 s., i. 211.

(z) Melbourne Papers, pp. 215 ff.

(a) Letters, 1 s., i. 230.

(b) Letters, 2 s., i. 399. The Queen urged the Premier to jettison the dissentients if need be.

George's attacks on the Upper House, nor would he believe that the Prime Minister could like them (c). Even Mr. Harcourt offended by references to "black hand of the peerage" and "edicts of assassination" of Governmental measures, on July 15th, 1909, but in that case there was the additional aggravation that the King had just been his guest (d). Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Churchill also were offenders in their allusions to foreign policies, and had to receive instruction from Sir E. Grey in the rules of etiquette in this regard (e). The King also insisted on having the definite advice, after full consideration by the Cabinet, that an Indian member should be added to the Council of the Governor-General, and when he yielded to that advice, he put his doubts on record (f).

A very difficult issue presents itself on the point how far it is necessary for the Prime Minister to inform the sovereign of matters which are not covered by his Cabinet reports, and therefore known to him. It is clear that courtesy alone demands that nothing major should be done without information being given. In the case where the royal prerogative is concerned, apart from the final formal assent, it is necessary that the royal consent to discussion should be obtained before the measure passes either House. Thus Lord Granville was right in 1863, when he asked the Lord Chancellor to hold over for such consent a Bill to deal with the Crown livings (g). When Mr. Gladstone commenced in opposition in 1868 his effort to disestablish the Irish Church, he duly proceeded, by way of address, praying the Crown to place at the disposal of Parliament its interest in the temporalities of that Church (h), and in the case of the various Bills brought forward for the purpose of affecting the creation of peers, royal permission for discussion has been duly (c) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 456 ff.

(d) Lee, ii. 665 f.

(e) Lee, ii. 655.

(f) Lee, ii. 388 f.

(g) Letters, 2 s., i. 77 f.

(h) Letters, 2 s., i. 517; see Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 521—26, for the issue whether he could have acted otherwise.

obtained (i), as also in the case of a measure, the Peace Bill, 1935, in the Commons, intended to limit the authority of the Crown to declare war. In other cases, however, the propriety of early intimation of legislation is plain, and Lord Melbourne duly apologised for bringing in a Bill dealing with municipal corporations in Ireland without prior notice to the King, who clearly ought not to have to read the papers to know what legislation is on foot (k). The Queen also had a good case in 1864 (l), when she took exception to Mr. Gladstone's expressing, when speaking on behalf of the Government, a view tantamount to recognising the eligibility of every person for the franchise, for the policy was not that of the ministry, and in fact deeply shocked Lord Palmerston. On the other hand, her efforts to prevent even the discussion of the Report of the Hartington Commission, which recommended the abolition of the office of Commander-in-Chief, was quite illegitimate (m), and equally impossible was her demand that Lord Rosebery should not intimate any new policy without consultation with her (n). Lord Rosebery made an effective and conclusive answer. If his proposals on the House of Lords had been intended to be brought before the Commons, he would, after mature Cabinet consideration, have submitted them to the Queen, but this principle could not well apply to proposals laid before a popular audience. To this it may be objected that, if a Government is to adopt a fundamental change of policy, then the matter should be determined in Cabinet, and then submitted for information to the Queen, who then could have the opportunity of suggesting difficulties, and endeavouring to modify the policy. But this ignores the fact that policy cannot well be formed and determined upon by the Cabinet without some idea of the public attitude thereon, and when it is inchoate a procedure like that on

(i) Asquith, Fifty Years of Parliament, ii. 95. Keith, Imperial Relations, 1916—35, p. 256.

(k) Melbourne Papers, pp. 307 ff

(l) Letters, 2 s., i. 189 ff.

(m) Letters, 3 s., i. 577.

(n) Letters, 3 s., ii. 433 ff.

this occasion of Lord Rosebery may be necessary in order to determine whether the time is ripe for action of the kind. But Lord Salisbury went to the absurd length, when consulted, no doubt improperly by the Queen, of contending that, if a Premier submitted a policy, and the Queen did not accept, he must resign. The ridiculous result would follow that every new policy would be accepted as approved by the Crown, and that the country would be asked to fight against plans which had the royal backing. On the other hand, the Queen had a perfectly valid grievance, when for some unexplained cause, the Spion Kop correspondence was issued without her sanction, and apparently by some blunder of Lord Lansdowne's (o). Edward VII. has an even better case, for his dislike of the terms of the declaration against transubstantiation, which he had to make before reading his first speech at the opening of Parliament, had secured the appointment of a committee to consider the possibility of changing the declaration, and its report was issued without communication to him (p), much to his indignation, by authority of the Lord Chancellor, who failed when rebuked to show serious repentance. It must be added that the King had further reason for annoyance, for the Bill carried by Lord Salisbury through the Lords, was unsatisfactory, and the Government left the whole matter over to be disposed of in 1910 by the Liberal ministry in the inoffensive Accession Declaration Act (q). In 1905 another error took place, for the delicate correspondence between Lord Curzon and Mr. Brodrick, regarding the position of the Indian military department and the Commander-in-Chief, was published without his consent (r). Moreover, Cabinet decisions were, as Lord Esher pointed out, constantly being taken under Mr. Balfour without any prior information to the King, and (o) Letters, 3 s., iii. 533, 536, 538, 541.

(p) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 23 f.

(q) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), p. 108.

(r) Esher, Journals, ii. 103—7, where an interesting comment on older usage is given.

he naturally feared that matters would be even worse under a Liberal régime. In fact, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman was not fond of sending long communications, and even so important a measure as the Education Bill was intimated to the King inadequately, to his annoyance (s). The same annoyance was renewed, when during the progress of that Bill on July 17th, 1906 (t), Mr. Lloyd George spoke as if a Minister for Wales had been decided upon, for the King demanded to know why this had not been before him earlier, and it had to be explained that all that was meant was a proposal to have a minister in charge of education for Wales. Mr. George's subsequent attacks on the Lords for their treatment of the Bill, and his demand (December 1st), whether the country is to be governed by the King and his peers, or by the King and his people, caused fresh annoyance, but on this occasion the Premier was prepared to defend his minister in view of the provocation given by the peers (u). The King was also deeply irritated by later phases of the attack, as above mentioned, and by Mr. George's attitude on female suffrage, especially his speech at the Albert Hall on December 5th, 1908, but the Premier pointed out that the issue was deliberately left open in the Cabinet (x). Mr. Asquith, however, as little as his predecessor complied with the royal standard of the giving of information, and no doubt the sovereign did not feel inclined to adopt Lord Esher's advice to bombard his ministers with demands for information (y).

There is little evidence how far of late the King has been kept fully informed of Cabinet proposals, and of proposals which may be brought before the Cabinet. There is evidence that he was taken fully into confidence by Mr. Asquith on the various war developments, and his letter of satisfaction

(s) Lee, Edward VII. ii. 455, 460 ff.

(u) Lee, ii. 457.

(t) Lee, ii. 456.

(x) Lee, ii. 653.

(y) For the failure of Mr. Gladstone to keep him informed of the proceedings regarding the illegal procession of Roman Catholics on September 13th, 1908, see Lee, ii. 659 ff.

at the passing of the first Conscription Act is on record (z). He was also notified of the necessity of reconstruction in 1916, and his action thereupon has been noted. There is no reason to doubt that Mr. Lloyd George followed the attitude of his predecessor in personal discussions and in communications. Of later practice there may be some more doubt. The affair of the Cabinet approval of the disastrous Hoare-Laval agreement in December, 1935, regarding Ethiopia suggests that the King was not effectively consulted in any way. The account given of the events leading up to the abdication of Edward VIII. suggests strongly that the Prime Minister and his sovereign were not in close communication. It seems, indeed, clear that the King had not much taste for the steady performance of business, which marked his father, and seemingly characterises his successor, whose interest in rearmament and defence was publicly attested by his visit in March, 1938, to the Imperial Defence College for Sir T. Inskip's address thereon, and in foreign affairs by the interviews given by him to ministers, and the British Ambassador at Rome in connection with the negotiations for a treaty with Italy.

It need hardly be said that the sovereign is in no wise bound to await ministerial initiative on any head. Queen Victoria was always ready to suggest the necessity of considering the strength of the defence forces, and had, as we have seen, strong views on Russo-Turkish policy, and on the treatment of Bulgaria, and its Prince by the Czar, which she deeply resented. It is recorded that the Prince drafted the instructions for the new volunteer corps, which the Cabinet approved (a), and that he submitted in 1855 a plan for the command of the army in the Crimea (b). More interesting is the vehement appeal of the Queen in 1872 (c)

(z) Spender, ii. 212.

(b) Ibid. iii. 381 f.

(c) Guedalla, i. 381—83. She also persuaded (she believed) Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Acland of the dangers of over-educating the working classes; Letters, 3 s., ii. 380 f.

(a) Martin, Prince Consort, iv. 437.

for steps to increase security of railway travel and punctuality; no doubt she had felt the difficulty in the latter respect in her pilgrimages to Balmoral, for the northern service remained unsatisfactory until long after the end of her reign. Of the initiative of later sovereigns there is less direct evidence, but Edward VIII.'s personal tours of inspection of depressed areas evidently impelled him to second, or even encourage, energetically the efforts of the ministry to relieve their difficulties, a matter taken up with satisfactory results under George VI., whose interest in the promotion of the physical welfare and recreation of his subjects is also recorded.

The sovereign is naturally entitled to expect that the Prime Minister (d) shall always be available for consultation except as otherwise arranged. Hence the royal rebuke (e) to Mr. Gladstone for his unexpected but quite impromptu visit to Denmark in 1883, which assumed a serious aspect in her eyes, because he was invited by the King to meet several royal personages. But her indignation led her into writing a letter called "somewhat unmanly" by Mr. Gladstone. There was much more cause for annoyance in the case of Mr. Asquith's failure to pay Edward VII. a visit (f) at Windsor, at the end of January, 1910. It is clear that the incident was merely inadvertent, and was not due to illness, and the King was not prepared to accept an effort by Mrs. Asquith to mitigate his just annoyance. Mr. Asquith, however, made due amends, and immediately on his return from Cannes visited the King at Brighton, where he obtained not merely his acceptance of the minister's changes consequent on the appointment of Lord Gladstone to South Africa, but his aid (g) in ascertaining how far the opposition leaders would go in aiding the Government to pass the budget, then (d) Sir W. Harcourt, as leader of the Commons, asked leave in 1894; Letters, 3 s., ii. 421 f.

(e) Guedalle, ii. 47, 242—48, Letters, 2 s., iii. 440, 444.

(f) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 270; Lee, Edward VII., ii. 697 n. 1, Esher, Journals, ii. 443 f.; the versions of this incident can be reconciled by dint of some interpretation only.

(g) Newton, Lansdowne, p. 389; Dugdale, Arthur James Balfour, ii. 59 f.

seriously threatened by the probable revolt of the Irish members. The result of the King's consultation was mainly negative, but the action taken bears out Mr. Spender's claim (h) that the King's relations with his Premier were satisfactory, despite the annoyance inherent to the sovereign's position therein involved.

(b) The King and the Work of the Departments.

As the Cabinet has advisory functions and decides but does not carry out policy, the connection of the King with the actual working of the departments is essential if he is to be able to take a full part in the process of government. It is in the departments or the Privy Council that advice is prepared for acts to be done by the King, and it is also necessary that, even where no action of his is required, he should be familiar with important issues to be decided. It must be remembered that he is always entitled in case of doubt to ask that the decision on a disputed issue shall be taken by the Cabinet.

The department with which in matter of policy the King is most closely connected is the Foreign Office, just as that is the department whose business the Prime Minister normally supervises in special degree. Reference has already been made to the disputes between the Queen, inspired by Prince Albert, and advised by Baron Stockmar, and Lord Palmerston (i). In 1849, Lord John Russell mediated by undertaking to revise drafts of despatches before submission to the Queen, and in 1850 the Queen laid down the conditions above mentioned, her right to have the foreign despatches sent, to consider drafts submitted, and to require that a policy once sanctioned must not be varied (k). The dismissal of Lord Palmerston in 1851, for disregard of a Cabinet decision not to recognise forthwith the French coup d'état, was justified by the Prime Minister, who pointed out that in matters of small importance the Secretary of State must be able to act independently, but not in great (l). The submission of drafts via the Premier was regarded as unconstitutional by Mr. Gladstone (m) and was dropped, but the Queen consistently objected to the despatch of telegrams without her formal approval, nor did Lord Rosebery dispute her claim in 1893, while explaining that failure to consult in one case was due to the absolute necessity of advising Lord Cromer that he must not take such drastic steps as he proposed to bring the Khedive to order (n). It seems clear that Edward VII. expected important despatches to be submitted before despatch (o); on the other hand, George V. seems not to have been inclined to insist on this special mode of procedure, especially as pressure in the war period rendered immediate action often necessary, just as the decision to send Mr. Churchill to Antwerp was taken without even Cabinet assent (p). But the Hoare-Laval fiasco suggests that to rush matters through, as was then done without consulting the King formally and full discussion, was a very unfortunate error. Obviously the King must be kept informed, and, as in the past, despatches received and sent must be supplied to him and are printed for immediate circulation to him and the Cabinet, and also for the Dominion Governments. Thus he can intervene at any time to enquire, and the Premier and Foreign Secretary, of course, are bound to give him full advice on any issues, either at his request or spontaneously.

(h) Spender, i. 270.

(k) See p. 102, ante.

(i) See p. 101, ante.

In no other department is the connection so close. The Queen indeed proposed to supervise Indian affairs when the Crown took over the government in 1858; despatches were to be sent for perusal, drafts of instructions submitted, the royal pleasure to be taken before appointments involving the royal name were made, prior sanction to be obtained

(l) 119 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 97.

(m) Gleanings of Past Years, I. 86 f.

(n) Letters, 3 s., ii. 205—8; for a solitary blunder by Lord Salisbury, see Letters, 3 s., ii. 581 f.

(o) Cf. Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 203.

(p) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 125.

before important issues were brought before Council, and Council minutes sent (q). The minutes were sent, but the rest of the arrangement seems to have been negligently carried out; at any rate, in 1898 (r), Lord George Hamilton decided to drop sending minutes, substituting copies of telegrams, and despatches of interest. Other matters, of course, went before the Queen separately, and she corresponded with Viceroys, and took a deep interest in certain aspects of Indian affairs, such as the treatment of the princes and the welfare of the people.

As regards the colonies, and later the Dominions, the rule was early adopted of referring to the Queen only matters of real importance (s), and the same principles were adopted under her successors. Thus, the Morley-Minto reform schemes went before the King in detail in 1907—9 (t), and the period of office of Lord Curzon was marked by the King's interest in the Coronation Durbar when he supported ministers against Lord Curzon (u), and in the dispute between Lord Curzon and Lord Kitchener (x). In like manner, he was far from anxious to see Lord Kitchener sent to India as Commander-in-Chief, and yielded mainly because of his intention otherwise to drop the service (y). On the other hand, he would have liked later on to see him Governor-General, but Lord Morley refused, and took advantage of his death to appoint Lord Hardinge. The King was indignant with Mr. Lyttelton in July, 1904, for offering a public funeral to President Kruger without consulting him, and at the terms in which he telegraphed approval in his name of the Chinese Labour Ordinance of 1904, though his financial friends persuaded him to approve the Ordinance itself, and to deprecate the hostility with

(q) Letters, 1 s., iii. 299 f.

(r) Letters, 3 s., iii. 267, 304 f.

(s) See her complaint in 1868 of being informed only after a despatch had gone on the issue of Nova Scotia's desire to be released from Canada; Letters, 2 s., i. 532, and in 1866 of action as regards Fenian prisoners in Canada; Letters, 2 s., i. 363 ff.

(t) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 378 ff., 384 ff.

(u) Lee, ii. 366 f.

(x) Lee, ii. 375—80.

(y) Lee, ii. 82 f.

which it was received (z). He found severe fault with Lord Elgin in 1906 (a) for the steps taken in this regard without prior sanction, an omission not repeated by that politician, and earlier he had protested against the Prime Minister's announcement on the subject at the Albert Hall (b). The Clerk of the Council luckily intervened to see that Lord Elgin was available to explain to the King the terms of a draft Order in Council regarding the franchise under the new Transvaal constitution, an interesting example of the mode in which the Crown is enabled to exercise its judgment on issues which have not been earlier submitted.

George V. had to deal with the vast constitutional changes in India marked by the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, and the still greater changes under the Government of India Act, 1935, and in 1912, himself, visited India for a Coronation Durbar, at which the important decision to transfer the capital of India to Delhi and to undo the partition of Bengal was announced (c). To the principles of these measures his assent was obtained fully. He was also deeply concerned in the vital changes in the structure of the Empire involved in the evolution of Dominion status, and, though he accepted the advice of ministers, it was with some doubt at the wisdom of the system which placed him in direct contact with the Dominions without the advice of the British Government.

In all these departments important appointments continue to be submitted for royal approval, and essential appointments receive full consideration.

The defence departments also occupied royal attention. The Queen insisted on full information being supplied, and Lord Lansdowne was reproved for alterations in names of regiments without her sanction (d). Very wisely, he did not attempt to deal with Lord Roberts' suggestion (e), of special (z) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 180.

(a) Ibid. ii. 479.

(b) Fitzroy, Memoirs, i. 197 (December 21st, 1905).

(c) Keith, Constitutional History of India, 1600—1935, pp. 234 f.

(d) Letters, 3 s., iii. 133.

(e) Ibid. 574 f.

stars for colonial troops without her views which, like his, were hostile. Edward VII. was indignant with Mr. Arnold-Forster for failing to keep him informed (f); “during the late Queen’s reign not a step was taken at the War Office, in connection with the army, of the slightest importance without her being informed of what was going on, and the King hopes the same course will be pursued with him,” and specifically he asked for communication of the proceedings of the Army Council, in addition to those of the Imperial Defence Committee already supplied. He then in detail criticised the proposals of his minister. Lord Haldane wisely, in his proposals, took him into his confidence, and secured his full co-operation and help in popularising the territorial army by the presentation of colours, and in other ways (g).

Of failure to keep the sovereign informed, the most amazing of recent record is the omission to inform him of the Curragh incident, of which he learned from the Press (h). It is recorded also that the Admiralty caused him just annoyance by their action in deciding on the creation of the rank of lieutenant-commander, without explaining the project, or obtaining his sanction prior to asking for formal approval in Council (i). The omission was the more surprising, for the King’s interest in the navy from his service therein was, naturally, especially great.

In one department the use of the assent of the Crown before it is actually given is regular. The Home Secretary submits his decisions as to pardons to the King for signification of his pleasure, but his conclusions are acted on forthwith (k). The practice is the more remarkable, because the sovereign on some occasions is really interested. Queen Victoria was not at all happy at the reprieve of Mrs. Maybrick, (f) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 200. For failure to inform him of the new naval base on the Forth, see Lee, ii. 50 (1903).

(g) Ibid. ii. 500 ff.

(h) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 47.

(i) Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 540 (March 9th, 1914). The King censured the First Lord and Prince Louis of Battenberg.

(k) Lee, Edward VII. ii. 39; Mr. Akers-Douglas, September 26th 1903.

condemned for poisoning her husband (l), and Edward VII. was not convinced of the justice of the reprieve of Rayner, the murderer of Mr. W. Whiteley, disliking concession to popular excitement when unjustified (m). In cases of political importance, of course, he was consulted (n), and the treatment of Mr. Lynch for rebellion shows his prudent judgment both in according clemency, and in marking none the less the seriousness of high treason. In Casement's Case (o) the decision was taken by the Cabinet, and thus the King's position was definitely dissociated from personal responsibility.

It is interesting to note Queen Victoria's action in insisting in anticipation of her Secretary of State's decision that the convict Lee, whose execution had been prevented by accident, should not be again subjected to an effort at execution (p). She very gladly secured in 1872 the exemption from signing death warrants in the case of criminals in the Isle of Man, which she had received in England, under the legislation passed on her accession (q).

In many other matters the Home Secretary is in frequent communication with the King, mainly for the purpose of securing signatures to many kinds of instrument, while he is the normal minister to be present on occasions on which the King comes officially into contact with his subjects, as in ceremonials of opening docks, as at Liverpool, or hospitals, or receiving addresses, and so on (r). A curious question arose in 1928 (s), when the Archbishop of Canterbury went to the King, then convalescing at Bognor Regis—the appellation (l) Letters, 3 s., i. 527 (August 22nd, 1889). Cf. in 1880; Gardiner, Harcourt, i. 397, on number of remissions.

(m) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 42.

(n) But the responsibility is solely ministerial: cf. Mayor of Cork's case, The Times, August 26th, 27th, 31st, 1920. See also Taylor, Brentford, pp. 182 ff.; Clynes, Memoirs, ii. 144.

(o) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 214 n. 2.

(p) Letters, s. 2, iii. 613. She was justly annoyed at the leniency of the sentence on her assailant O'Connor in 1872 (Guedalla, i. 344—47), and at the form of verdict in Maclean's case (1882) (ibid. ii. 179 ff., 186 f.).

(q) Letters, 2 s., ii. 223; 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 77.

(r) Taylor, Brentford, pp. 203—9.

(s) Taylor, pp. 272—74.

was given later—in order to do homage on appointment. The oath on such occasions is properly administered by the Home Secretary, and the Prime Minister's decision to act instead was questioned formally by Mr. Joynson-Hicks as illegal, not, indeed, on the basis of statute, but of established usage. Unquestionably he had a strong case, but in the absence of statute to assert illegality was strictly speaking impossible. Most of the duties, however, of the Home Secretary are rather formal than such as involve issues on which the sovereign would desire to form or express views, as in the case of the granting the fiat to petitions of right, which is a matter dealt with on fixed principles.

In certain questions, however, the Crown takes personal cognisance, above all, those affecting the police force of the metropolis. The post of Commissioner is regularly submitted to the sovereign (t), but Mr. Monro's appointment in 1898 proved hopelessly unsatisfactory (u), as he championed the cause of the police against the Government, badly represented by the Home Secretary, Mr. Matthews, and had to be replaced by Sir Edward Bradford, after serious police unrest and rioting, the postmen having chosen the occasion to engineer a strike (x). The Queen was most anxious that Mr. Matthews should be displaced, and she secured that he should not be included in the ministry of 1895. In 1918 (y) the outbreak of a grave police strike took the ministry by surprise, as it had not been foreseen, and Sir Edward Henry was working for the provision of better terms for the police. The resignation of the Home Secretary was refused, but that of Sir E. Henry accepted, and he was given no opportunity to present his defence (z). The remarkable appointment by Mr.

(t) E.g., Letters, 3 s., i. 452.

(u) Sir C. Warren had resigned and the Cabinet had accepted his resignation as he denied the supremacy of the Home Secretary. Letters, 3 s., i. 448 f. The Queen at this time was ready to offer suggestions as to discovering the author of the "Jack the Ripper" murders, then horrifying London.

(x) Letters, 3 s., i. 616, 622.

(y) Mallet, Cave, pp. 216 ff.

(z) The treatment of a subordinate in this way seems of dubious justice.

Joynson-Hicks to the Commissionership in 1928 of Lord Byng, was, no doubt, only rendered possible by the latter's reluctance to refuse a post offered to him with royal approval (a).

Any failure to submit appointments of importance is, of course, most careless. Mr. Wyndham was severely called to account (b) by Edward VII. for appointing Sir A. Macdonnell to be his Under-Secretary without prior approval, though in fact he welcomed the choice made.

(c) The King and the Opposition.

It is an essential feature of the system of Cabinet government that the sovereign is advised on political issues by the ministry alone. This was asserted clearly by Earl Grey under William IV., when the Duke of Wellington addressed the Crown on the danger of the arming of political societies during the political excitement of the moment. The King replied, though he did not accept the suggestions made, but Lord Grey pointed out that it might produce inconvenience if His Majesty were to express opinions to any but his confidential servants on matters which might come under their consideration, and the King promised only to acknowledge such communication in future (c). There is, of course, no possibility of preventing the tendering of advice by ex-ministers, and a peer still has, in theory, the right to ask for an audience to proffer such advice (d), but the practice is obsolescent or obsolete, and no reply of substance is made. That a Privy Councillor as such is entitled to offer advice (e) must be negatived, if by that is meant that his advice is of any more meaning constitutionally than that of any private person who may choose to address the Crown. Unless and until summoned to the Council or to the Crown, a Privy Councillor is in the position of an ordinary subject, save in so far as he enjoys ceremonial precedence and style.

(a) Taylor, Brentford, pp. 217—20.

(b) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 50.

(c) Corr. with William IV., i. 413—24.

(d) Letters, 1 s., i. 335, 343.

(e) Cf. Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, p. 243.

Relations, therefore, between the sovereign and ex-ministers, or other leaders of the opposition, be they peers or Privy Councillors, or simple commoners, are necessarily delicate. It was quite natural in the infancy of the new system that the position of the Queen to Lord Melbourne led to the continuation of their correspondence after he quitted office. The danger of this action was patent to Baron Stockmar (f), who strongly deprecated it, and Sir R. Peel made it clear that he would not remain in office if he found that the Queen was taking advice from his rival. But nothing untoward happened. Lord Melbourne was not of the temperament to seek to overthrow his opponent by form of intrigue, even if the Prince had not been there to object, and it is not seriously arguable that the general constitutional instruction, which he imparted, could injuriously affect the Queen's relations with her new ministry. Peel himself, after retirement, continued an innocuous correspondence with Prince Albert.

The same innocence of real harm cannot be predicated of the correspondence of the Queen with Lord Beaconsfield (g). Unhappily, the Queen by this time had lost confidence in Mr. Gladstone, and, as she had never fully appreciated her duty (h) to support loyally any ministry marked out by the vote of the electorate, she had no hesitation in seeking aid from her late adviser, and in revealing to him the plans of her ministry. Fortunately, serious injury to the position of the Crown was prevented by the early death of Lord Beaconsfield, whose share in the correspondence clearly permits of no excuse. The truth, of course, is that by various means, including certainly exaggerated flattery, the ex-Premier had established with the Queen relations of so close a character that she found it quite impossible to treat her new Premier with fairness (i). While excuses, no doubt, will be found by ingenious writers for the royal action, the fact that it was (f) Letters, 1 s., i. 340, 353, 360 f.; ii. 93.

(g) Gladstone, After Thirty Years, pp. 337 f., 356 ff.

(h) See Martin, Prince Consort. i. 110, for the Prince's recognition.

(i) Guedalla, ii. 3 ff.

unconstitutional is really not open to dispute, and it is not believed that the practice has ever since been revived. The Queen certainly does not appear to have gone so far with Lord Salisbury.

Leaving this case apart, the rules as to communications with the opposition still present difficulties. There are, however, certain principles to be discerned.

(1) When a ministry resigns, it is right and proper for the Crown to make enquiries in any directions which it thinks fit to secure a new ministry. There was clearly nothing undesirable in the reference made to the Duke of Wellington, to Lord Lansdowne and to Lord Aberdeen (k) above referred to, and there is no reason whatever to suppose that the principle does not still stand good. That there is little evidence of recent usage is due simply to the development of the party system under which normally a leader stands out for selection to head the party. It will be remembered that in 1886 (l) Mr. Goschen declined respectfully to call on the Queen to give her advice, because her course was so obviously to send for Mr. Gladstone that there was no real possibility of him giving other counsel. We have, however, a certain reappearance of the right to secure advice in 1916, when Mr. Lloyd George determined to exclude Mr. Asquith from effective control of the war. The resignation of Mr. Asquith and the Cabinet was tendered on December 5th, 1916, and Mr. Bonar Law, who was sent for by the King, and on December 6th Mr. Lloyd George, were unable to accept responsibility. The King suggested a meeting at Buckingham Palace (m), which was held on the afternoon of December 6th. What happened is uncertain. Mr. Balfour had first audience, and later he and Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Asquith, and Mr.

(k) See p. 39, ante.

(l) Letters, 3 s., i. 27 f.

(m) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 272 ff.; Dugdale, Balfour, ii. 175 ff. We know now that the King in 1923 deliberately asked Lord Balfour's views on Mr. Bonar Law's successor; Dugdale, ii. 359 ff. The views of Mr. Amery, Mr. Bridgeman, Lord Long, Lord Salisbury, and the Labour party seem to have been tendered spontaneously; Nicolson, Curzon, pp. 355 f.

Henderson were those present. It is alleged by Mr. Lloyd George that all save Mr. Asquith were willing to serve under Mr. Balfour, but this is plainly a mistake. Mr. Balfour records a general discussion, which, at the royal request, he summed up as leading to the conclusion that if either Mr. Bonar Law or Mr. Lloyd George were chosen, Mr. Asquith would not serve, and Mr. Henderson was in that case doubtful of Labour support for a coalition ministry. Both the latter, however, pointed out that their views were rather strongly put, and the final conclusion was that Mr. Bonar Law should form a Government to include Mr. Asquith, if possible. That was rejected by the Liberal leader with the solid support of his party, except Mr. Montagu, and Mr. Bonar Law then declined to go on with the attempt to form a ministry, and gave instead his support to Mr. Lloyd George. Mr. Bonar Law then called upon Mr. Balfour and offered him the Foreign Office, which he accepted. When it is remembered that Mr. Asquith had just before refused to meet the wishes of Mr. Lloyd George to remove Mr. Balfour from the Admiralty (n), Mr. Balfour's action cannot be said to stand out as remarkable for gratitude or chivalry. But his anxiety for office was natural, and he seems wholly to have failed to see that his conduct in this matter fell short of any reasonable standard of candour. But the formation of the coalition of 1916 is not an episode of which any of those sharing in it could be proud (o). Mr. Balfour's acceptance of the combination, in the hands of Mr. Lloyd George, of the functions of head of the Government and controller of the War Council, which he had declared to the King impossible, and which had been denounced by Mr. George in the case of Mr. Asquith, is clearly without defence. That his removal from the Admiralty was in the national interest cannot be denied. His acceptance of his ejection by Mr. Lloyd George is conclusive that he felt that he had muddled matters.

(n) Spender, ii. 265 f.

(o) On Mr. Lloyd George's conduct and the manipulation of the Press in his favour, see Spender, ii. 248—71. Mrs. Dugdale's apologia (ii. 156 ff.) for Balfour is not satisfactory.

In 1931, again, the ministry was conscious of its inability to face the situation caused by the reckless finance for which its leaders were responsible. The final decision of the ministry to resign was followed by a conference between the retiring Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, and Sir A. Sinclair, which led to the creation of a National Government. The action of the King in favouring such action was clearly unexceptionable, and has been recognised as such by as impartial and well-informed an authority as Lord Passfield (p). The propriety of the acceptance of office by Mr. MacDonald, who was largely responsible as head of the ministry for the mismanagement of the affairs of the Government by Mr. Snowden and Mr. Thomas, is a very different thing, and the bitterness of the Labour Party against these men can easily be understood and sympathised with. The principle of noblesse oblige would have dictated refusal at any rate to accept the power and emoluments of office.

(2) Another class of case allows unquestionably of royal action, the grant of assistance to ministers in seeking accommodation of difficulties. The ways of a peacemaker are hard, but royal mediation has one great advantage, that the King should command courtesy from those he approaches. There is only one recorded case to the contrary, attested by Mr. A. Chamberlain (q) dealing with the somewhat insolent attitude of Mr. Bonar Law to the King on May 4th, 1912, on the question of his position in respect to the Government of Ireland Bill. But it must be remembered that Mr. Bonar Law was essentially a new man, who brought with him the lack of refinement of those without political traditions.

Queen Victoria naturally was ready for action, even without any prompting of the Government. That was natural in cases where some interest of her own of a private character was concerned, as in her approach in 1856 to Lords Derby and Lyndhurst to aid the passage of legislation mooted for dealing with the precedence of Prince Albert (r), a matter later disposed of otherwise. Lord Derby in 1863 was asked to favour the project of purchasing the buildings and site of the exhibition of 1851, which was inseparably connected with the Prince's enlightened activity. The land was purchased, but the maintenance of the buildings was vetoed by the Commons, despite Mr. Gladstone's best efforts, which, Lord Palmerston held, were defeated in part by his lack of caution in showing how utterly wrong his opponents were (s). Personal reasons, affecting her own health, explain in part her urgent appeal in 1866 to Lord Derby to come to some arrangement on the issue of reform; Lord Derby proved obdurate, considering the Bill fatal to the constitution, an amusing view, since next year his Government was to pass a much more dangerous measure (t). Next year she endeavoured to secure Liberal support for a settlement, and urged Mr. Disraeli not to be led away by the "tea-room revolt" against Mr. Gladstone, into failing to remember the necessity of conciliation. Both these demarches were uninspired by the ministry, but innocuous. Much more important was her action in 1869 in regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The Queen arranged a meeting between Archbishop Tait and Mr. Gladstone (u), and later on, when after refraining from voting on the second reading, which thus passed, the Archbishop claimed amendments, she used her influence with her Premier and the Archbishop to secure an agreed settlement. No doubt Lord Cairns' attitude in this case was important, for he explained to the Lords that this was a case where the verdict of the electors had pointed out the duty of the Upper Chamber, but there is no need to minimise her services.

(p) See p. 44, ante.

(q) Politics from Inside, pp. 486 f.

Naturally the Queen was equally ready to help Lord Beaconsfield in 1877, by offering to use her influence with the (r) Letters, 1 s., iii. 194, 196 f.

(s) Letters, 2 s., i. 89 ff., 97 ff.

(t) Letters, 2 s., i. 330 f.

(u) Davidson, Archbishop Tait, ii. ch. xix.; Guedalla, i. 151—56, 159—63, 167, 189—92.

opposition (x) to induce them not unduly to trouble the Government at that critical time by questions regarding its Russian policy; she actually did communicate with Mr. Forster and the Duke of Argyll. But she also asked Sir S. Northcote and Lord Beaconsfield to help in 1881 (y), the Governmental plan to counter Irish obstruction, a matter, of course, of common interest, and one on which negotiations between the parties were in train, and in 1892 Lord Salisbury, in deference to her, was asked to refrain from pressing a fatal amendment to the Arrears Bill (z). It seems clear that he would not have given way, but the Queen had engaged the aid of the Duke of Abercorn, who managed to carry other members of the party, so that Lord Salisbury could only denounce it. In both cases she acted spontaneously, as also in her criticism of the opposition's apparent sympathy with the rebel Arabi Pasha, whom the Queen heartily disapproved of.

Far more important was her action in 1884 (a) over the dispute between the two Houses over the franchise and redistribution. She there had the full consent of the Premier, and wrote to Lord Salisbury to urge him to compromise. He was not willing to do so, but among further activities she interviewed the Duke of Richmond, who influenced Lord Cairns and Lord Salisbury, and the invaluable Sir H. Ponsonby served as intermediary for a long correspondence between Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone, the net outcome being that a system of redistribution was agreed upon, and the Representation of the People Act, 1884, was allowed to pass. There is no doubt of the value of her services in this case. In like manner, in 1885, she mediated between Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury on the vexed issue of the assurances to be given regarding financial business by the former, if the latter were to take the burden of Government at a time when, owing to redistribution, he could not at once

(x) Letters, 2 s., ii. 532, 534, 538.

(y) Letters, 2 s., iii. 187.

(z) Letters, 2 s., iii. 320, 325 f.

(a) Morley, iii. 130 ff.; Letters, 2 s., iii. 515, 518 ff., 537, 542 ff., 577; Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 320—23, 379 f.

dissolve, and must, therefore, be in some measure dependent on the goodwill of his opponent (b).

The precedent of 1869 was followed in 1906 by Edward VII., for he urged communications on the Education Bill between the Premier and the Archbishop of Canterbury. But the attempt to secure accord proved vain (c), considerably to the royal annoyance, which was repeated on the failure of the Licensing Bill. In 1908, the King urged Lord Roberts, on the suggestion of the Premier, not to raise the dangerous issue of the possibility of invasion (d). In 1909, he suggested (e) that he might communicate with and bring pressure to bear on the opposition as regards the Finance Bill, and Mr. Asquith approved such action, stressing the precedent of the royal intervention of 1832, though, of course, the position was not wholly parallel, for then, as in 1869 and 1884, royal intervention had not come until after the Lords had started amending the Bills. Before this (f), however, he had obtained from Lord Cawdor on October 2nd, while at Balmoral, a memorandum giving his view on the position of the Lords on the budget, which was naturally entirely opposed to the official view presented by Mr. McKenna in a memorandum of September 27th. On October 12th, the King saw Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne at Buckingham Palace, and reported to Mr. Asquith that they had not yet decided the issue. But, in fact, the party was now under the influence of two great driving forces, that of the wealthy party supporters, who feared that they would be hard hit by the budget, and that of the tariff reformers, who were afraid that the budget might prove to solve the problem of the source of the extra revenue urgently needed for the Governmental social policies and defence. The Lords therefore rejected the budget, and the

(b) Letters, 2 s , iii. 670 ff.

(c) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 461 f.; Spender, Campbell-Bannerman. ii. 301 ff.

(d) Esher, Journals and Letters, ii. 360 f.

(e) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 257.

(f) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 667, gives the correct order of events. There is no evidence of Mr. Asquith's consent to this action.

royal effort to seek some compromise thereafter was ineffective (g).

A different issue arose after the second election in 1910, for Mr. Asquith was far from anxious to encourage the King to act as mediator. He suggested a parallel with George III.'s efforts to obtain advice from opposing sides with a view to form his own policy, which had been abandoned after the accession of Mr. Pitt to power (h). But, when the King insisted that he sought information, not advice, he reluctantly gave way, and the King saw Lord Lansdowne on January 27th, 1911 (i). There is no doubt that Lord Lansdowne kept within the limits of stating his view of the position taken up by the opposition, but the whole affair was unreal in so far as the King could not mention his own promise to create peers if the Government had an adequate majority, which by that time had been secured.

In the grave crisis of 1913—14 on the Government of Ireland Bill, the King sought steadily to mediate between the angry combatants. How badly he was treated by Mr. Bonar Law in 1912 has already been noted, and the Conservatives, it must be admitted, showed as little readiness to compromise as they had done under his father. But he persisted (k); he asked representatives to Balmoral so that they could talk matters over; he secured personal contact between Mr. Asquith and Sir E. Carson (l); he induced the Government to consider the possibility of excluding Ulster for a definite period which would secure that it could not be included without a further election. He endeavoured to secure by a conference in July accord (m), just as he had done as regards the Parliament Bill in 1910.

(g) Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 388 f. For the King's attempt in February, 1910, to help accord on the budget, see p. 372, ante.

(h) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 306 (December, 1910).

(i) Newton, Lansdowne, p. 409.

(k) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 28 ff.

(l) Colvin, Carson, ii. 287; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, pp. 605—7, 643—45.

(m) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 53 f.

Obscurity marks the accounts of his share in bringing about the Irish settlement of 1921. Undoubtedly, the speech from the throne on the inauguration of the Parliament of Northern Ireland, June 22nd, 1921, contained the germ of subsequent negotiations leading up to the treaty of 1921. Responsibility, of course, for the speech rested with the Premier, but that the King had pressed for it was then widely believed and has never been rendered unlikely. The sovereign, of all people, was the one most anxious to secure the cessation of a civil war waged without pity or decency by both sides.

Of the royal mediation in 1931 (n), mention has already been made. It is patent that the functions of the sovereign in this connection are as important as they are delicate. The obvious danger is that of seeking to act too early, for that suggests distrust of ministerial proposals which the King should not feel or at least manifest. On the other hand, to delay may result in both sides having so committed themselves that neither can make the vital concessions which will secure peace.

With these legitimate interventions must be contrasted the actions of Queen Victoria in regard to Mr. Gladstone after the defeat of Lord Salisbury's Government in the election of 1885. She had then definitely endeavoured to induce the Whig elements to refuse support to Mr. Gladstone (o), and, when he took office without their aid, she endeavoured by communications with Mr. Goschen and Lord Salisbury to form an alliance of Whigs and Conservatives which would be effective to defeat any attempt at Home Rule (p). Both these politicians were ultimately agreed in advising the Queen that a dissolution would be advantageous, and should, therefore, be granted to Mr. Gladstone (q). Mr. Gladstone, therefore, was gladly given his dissolution, the request for which he (n) For 1916, see p. 433. Cf. Addison, Four and a Half Years, i. 270, who asserts efforts at intervention by Lord Stamfordham.

(o) Letters, 2 s., iii. 709 ff.; 3 s., i. 5 ff.

(p) Ibid. 3 s., i. 32 ff., 37, 41, 45, 49 f., 79, 90 f., 98, 101, 111 f., 116 f.

(q) Ibid. 128 ff., 131 f., 134 f.

supported by reference to the wishes of the opposition, not knowing that the Queen had already canvassed it (r). It certainly does not appear that the Queen was giving away any secrets of the ministry, but her action is quite without defence on the fundamental theory of responsible government that it is the will of the electorate that is to prevail, and that the sovereign must honestly co-operate with each ministry.

There have been noted above the efforts made by the Queen in 1893 and 1894 (s) to obtain from Lord Salisbury and others assistance in ejecting Mr. Gladstone and Lord Rosebery from office. All that can be said is that she was now so obsessed by the idea that any action was sound, if it delayed Home Rule, that she did not realise that her action was unconstitutional. Nor is it unusual to find apologists for her action, who themselves are plainly animated by the same conviction. How unwise it was, the loss of Eire to the Commonwealth in anything but name, and the fact that British subjects are therein aliens, show clearly (t).

(d) The King's Sources of Knowledge.

Primarily in the nature of things the royal knowledge on which decisions are based rests on the information supplied by the ministers, who suggest also the conclusions to be reached. But, patently, no king can work without aid, and George III. used Sir H. Taylor in the capacity of private secretary. George IV. had the aid of Sir W. Knighton, while William IV. recurred to Sir H. Taylor, who is well known from Earl Grey's correspondence with him. Lord Melbourne undertook the work for Queen Victoria, but mention must also be made of Baron Stockmar, who undertook the task of mentor to Prince Albert and the young Queen. His devotion to both was plain, his erudition considerable, though his constitutional knowledge was rather acridly described by Mr. Gladstone (u) as an English top-dressing on a German soil. To regard him as Victoria's "guardian angel" (x) requires some imagination. The Prince, himself, had as private secretary the attractive George Anson (1840—47), and from 1849 to his death General Grey served. On his death, no formal appointment of General Grey was made until 1867, and he died in 1870. His virtues are recorded with much distinction of phrase in Mr. Gladstone's farewell to Sir Henry Ponsonby, his successor in 1894. Ponsonby died in 1895, having been praised with equal cordiality by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli; his acute judgment is seen in the papers published in Sidelights on Queen Victoria. Sir Arthur Bigge took his place; his action in October, 1900, in securing from the Queen unsparing condemnation of the sanitary defects of Windsor is a pleasing testimonial to a kindly disposition (y). Under Edward VII. Lord Knollys was active, while his predecessor aided the Duke of York and then became secretary to George V. After his death in 1931, Sir C. Wigram took his place, and though a change was made under Edward VIII. he continued to serve George VI., being given the post of political adviser as well as that of Keeper of the Archives given by Edward VIII. The taking on as secretary by George VI. of Sir A. Hardinge marked the fact that the latter was in no way discredited by his service under the former sovereign.

(r) Letters, 3 s., i. 143.

(s) p. 370, ante.

(t) Social relations with the opposition leaders are, of course, a matter of discretion. But the formal creation in 1937 of a salaried post of leader renders a royal invitation, such as that of Mr. and Mrs. Attlee to Windsor in April, 1938, peculiarly appropriate.

These officers (z) and their subordinates necessarily acquire great masses of information from all sorts of sources, and may be in touch with ex-ministers, as well as ministers, officials, and so forth. No one doubts their competence, of which evidence for Queen Victoria is afforded occasionally by the memoranda included in the publication of her correspondence.

On July 23rd, 1873, Sir H. Ponsonby (a) gave a singularly warm commendation of Mr. Cardwell's army reforms to the (u) Gleanings, i. 84.

(x) P. Crabites, Victoria's Guardian Angel.

(y) Letters, 3 s., iii. 607 f.

(z) See P. Emden, Behind the Throne.

(a) Letters, 2 s., ii. 265 f.

Queen, endeavouring, it is clear, to persuade her that her minister was devoted to the maintenance of the royal prerogative, and was careful of the position of the Commander-in-Chief, who had, at last, been brought under proper subordination to the minister. The Queen in 1879 suggested that he should disseminate her dislike of Mr. Gladstone and his policies, referring to similar services rendered by Baron Stockmar and Mr. Anson, which obviated the actual emergence of such difficulties as that of the ladies of the bedchamber in 1839. His Whig friends would enable him to do so effectively (b). But there is much less authority for the allegation that Lord Stamfordham was hostile to the Government of Ireland Bill in 1914; the pressure of worrying events then filled society with rumours of all kinds. What is clear is that he endeavoured to induce the Conservatives to moderate the ferocity of their language, but without success. Mr. Bonar Law seems never to have quite appreciated that the British tradition, as opposed to the Canadian, deprecated extreme violence of denunciation in Parliament (c).

Beside ordinary members of the royal entourage must be mentioned Lord Esher, who managed to have himself recognised as a quasi-permanent adviser to the Crown on military and constitutional questions. His service on the War Office Reconstitution Committee provided him with much information, and he was authorised to study and organise the records of royal correspondence (d). Lord Esher was definitely Conservative in outlook, and his position was decidedly anomalous, but Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman seems to have approved of his services, as had Mr. Balfour, and there is no reason to doubt that his aim was to forward to the utmost of his ability the interests of the Crown and his country.

Other sources of information were naturally available, and the quality varied considerably. Queen Victoria's reliance in

(b) Letters, 2 s., iii. 48.

(c) Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, p. 617 ff. Cf. Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 551.

(d) Journals, i. 292; ii. 56.

ecclesiastical affairs on the advice of Randall Davidson was profound, and Lord Palmerston had no effect on her when he criticised her desire to have more than one name submitted for a vacant canonry at Westminster, by suggesting that this involved a reference of “a recommendation by one of your Majesty’s responsible advisers to the judgment of your Majesty’s irresponsible advisers in such matters” (e). The Queen merely insisted on her right to make enquiries regarding the qualifications of persons submitted. No doubt she was greatly influenced by her entourage (f), but that must not be exaggerated; her action in telegraphing en clair (g) to Mr. Gladstone, in vehement terms, regarding the position of General Gordon seems clearly enough spontaneous, rather than prompted, and Mr. Gladstone’s observation that “he does not presume to estimate the means of judgment possessed by your Majesty” was sufficient rebuke. Unluckily, after the split on Home Rule, there is no doubt of the fact that the views of Liberals were hardly represented at all in the circles of the Court, a fact which made it increasingly difficult for the Queen to behave with due impartiality. In any case it was long inevitable that the sovereign should hardly come into effective contact with opinion not of a markedly Conservative or Whig character. Queen Victoria, no doubt, knew something of the Scottish peasantry from her connection with John Brown and otherwise, as can be seen from Leaves from a Journal of our Life in the Highlands from 1848 to 1861, and the further volume covering the period to 1882. She had the advantage of intercourse with Dr. Norman Macleod (h), a Scottish divine, representing the democratic spirit of the Church of Scotland, as well as with another Scotsman of far different character, a Conservative statesman in political outlook, Randall Davidson. But it would be difficult to think of a single Liberal in political views with whom she had contact, not essentially official. Her son, Prince Leopold,

(e) Letters, 2 s., i. 236, 240.
(g) Letters, 2 s., iii. 597 f.

(f) Letters, 3 s., ii. 172 (Gladstone).
(h) Letters, 2 s., i. 376, 380; ii. 217.

was essentially unsound in his views, as when he encouraged her in the belief that the Queen's speech was a matter in which she was personally concerned. It was only late in her life that she listened much to the views of the Prince of Wales (i), who, at least, had the advantage that he knew socially a number of highly placed Liberals, and who had the vision to get into touch socially with Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman before the time came for political intercourse. As regards Labour party contacts it is plain that even George V. had little connection with members of that party; Lord Snowden tells us that in 1923, he, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Clynes were invited to meet the King and the Queen at a dinner given by Lady Astor, while Mr. MacDonald was invited to Buckingham Palace. It was noted, no doubt correctly, at the time of the abdication of Edward VIII. that, though he had many acquaintances and a variety of personal friends, not all of orthodox character, he was not in effective contact with a single representative of Labour opinions, a fact which no doubt helps to explain his complete failure to appreciate the probable reaction of his matrimonial project. Even the present sovereign, it is pointed out, has an entourage essentially non-Labour in outlook, and the point of Mr. Attlee's suggestion regarding the reduction of royal ceremonial in 1937 was the feeling that the etiquette which surrounds the sovereign inevitably separates him from the vast majority of his people, and prevents his appreciating the standpoint of large sections of his subjects. How far that bias is now counteracted by the activity of the sovereign and his consort in seeking to learn closely of the life of the workers it is difficult to say. Obviously, the experience obtained by the Duke of Kent in service under the Home Office must serve to broaden the mind, and help to keep the Court in touch with realities. Nevertheless, men like Sir S. Cripps, while accepting hereditary monarchy as the best type of constitution, have not hesitated to assert that in the event of a Labour Government attaining power, and seeking to carry through the policy approved by the electorate, it would find a steady focus of resistance in the royal entourage (k). This view, it may be hoped, is pessimistic. George V. certainly accommodated himself remarkably to the spirit of the times, and that his son will do likewise seems natural, and, indeed, inevitable.

(i) For his Conservative leanings see Hardie, Pol. Infl. of Queen Victoria, pp. 184 ff.

In matters of defence Queen Victoria was curiously placed, for in her time the tradition of the special position of the Crown with regard to the forces was much alive, and was strengthened by the fact that her cousin, the Duke of Cambridge, was Commander-in-Chief, and that by custom his position was one of imperfect subordination to the Secretary of State. It was, therefore, natural that she should oppose every measure which was not approved by him, and it was only in 1895 that Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, by a combination of tact and firmness, persuaded the Queen to secure his resignation of an office whose tenure by him would have proved fatal to military reform.

Edward VII. was wont to place great confidence in chosen advisers on technical subjects, and in matters affecting the fleet he relied on Sir J. Fisher (l) from 1904 onwards. The position of this officer in relation to the sovereign was regularised ingeniously in making him principal aide-de-camp to the King in addition to his position as First Sea Lord, in which, of course, he could normally not have had any right of direct access to the sovereign, though he might have been deputed to discuss matters with him. Sir J. Fisher, the value of whose services to the navy has probably been exaggerated, was certainly of erratic temperament, and he had no hesitation in tendering to the King advice on political issues, most of which must, to judge from what has been made known of his opinions, have been utterly valueless; the (k) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), p. 138.

(l) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 327 ff. Cf. Churchill's character sketch: World Crisis, 1911—14, pp. 72—79.

King called them "effusions." In military matters he relied on the opinions of his Adjutant-General, Sir T. Kelly-Kenny (m), but the Haldane reforms found him ready to accord full support, though he insisted on careful consideration of the counter-proposals of Lord Roberts (n). It is clear that, if the sovereign is to have any useful views on such issues, access to advice of experts, even if not serving the Government of the day, is valuable, and a stimulant in discussions with ministers. No real jealousy of this form of advice can seriously be felt by the latter.

Nor can there be any impropriety in the encouragement given by Queen Victoria to direct communications from the Viceroy (o), Governors, Ambassadors, and military and naval commanders, though doubtless such action requires to be carefully guarded on either side. These communications are essentially informative and personal, and the difficulty arises only when efforts are made to induce royal intervention by such communications. A very bad case of transgression of rules occurred on March 31st, 1885 (p), when the Queen communicated with Lord Wolseley, urging him not to retreat from the Sudan, but to hold Khartoum firmly. "She fears some of the Government are very unpatriotic, and do not feel what is a necessity." No wonder she asked the recipient to destroy this message, which he loyally did. Contemporaneously Lord Hartington (q) had to suggest that she should telegraph her congratulations to generals in the field through the War Office, and not as she had done after the victory of Abu Klea direct. The Queen's anger was magnificent; she had always telegraphed direct to her generals, and always would, but she admitted she usually sent an official telegram

(m) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 86 f.

(n) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 503—5. Lord Roberts wrote to Lord Stamfordham on the Curragh incident; Chamberlain, Politics from Inside, p. 628.

(o) Lord Lansdowne was rebuked by the Secretary of State in April, 1891, for not telegraphing direct to the Queen regarding Manipur; Letters, 3 s., i. 21.

(p) Letters, 2 s., iii. 633 f. Cf. her letter to Lady Wolseley, 619.

(q) Letters, 2 s., iii. 594 f.

also, but had forgotten or omitted to do so on this occasion. “ But she thinks Lord Hartington’s letter very officious and impertinent in tone. The Queen has the right to telegraph congratulations and enquiries to anyone, and won’t stand dictation. She won’t be a machine. But the Liberals always wish to make her feel that, and she won’t accept it.” The tact with which Sir H. Ponsonby wrote to the minister was perfect; a simple statement of the Queen’s regular practice and of regret at her omission to telegraph the message simultaneously to Lord Hartington. Thus was intercourse between the Queen and her ministers rendered possible without a breach.

Under Edward VII., an interesting case of the limits of such direct correspondence is recorded. Lord Curzon was anxious that at the Coronation Durbar to celebrate the royal accession there should be an announcement in the King’s name of a remission of taxation in accordance with oriental precedent. But the ministry was hostile, and the Viceroy appealed to the King to overrule it. The King in no way snubbed this appeal, but explained that he had discussed the matter with the Prime Minister and other ministers, and found them unanimously determined against the policy, and expressed the hope that Lord Curzon would drop the proposal, which he could not sanction. But he urged him also to abandon any idea of resignation of office on this score, and the Viceroy complied (r). In the same way the King received direct communications from Lord Minto regarding his reform scheme, and, though he never liked the placing of an Indian in the Viceroy’s Council, he accepted the decision of the Cabinet in its favour, though not even Lord Minto convinced him of the wisdom of the step (s).

India affords a rather curious instance of influence brought to bear on the Queen from an unexpected source, namely, the (r) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 366 f. The Cabinet resented his action; Dugdale, Balfour, i. 395 f.

(s) Lee, ii. 387—9, 709.

Indian secretary, who in her later days taught her Hindustani and, in the opinion of Lord Ponsonby, exercised an influence less justifiable than that of John Brown. To him may be traced the rather surprising efforts made by the Queen to secure mercy for the ringleader in the murder of the Chief Commissioner of Assam, in Manipur, which happily were resisted firmly by Lord Lansdowne, supported by the Secretary of State (t). More justifiable was her hostility to the failure of courtesy on the part of residents at Indian courts to the rulers. No doubt she overlooked the moral defects and political incapacity of many of the rulers, which helped to explain the high-handed treatment meted to them by the residents, but Lord Curzon also found that there were grave errors made in this regard, and the Queen would have applauded her views (u). As in the case of the colonies, she was anxious to have all important despatches from India submitted to her; in this way, as in the case par excellence of the Foreign Office, her private communications enabled her more effectively to follow the official despatches.

The Queen had no desire to entertain direct relations with ambassadors. George IV. had already been told by George Canning (x) that, while he would be sorry to do anything displeasing to the King, it was his duty to be present at every interview between the King and a foreign representative, and Victoria never desired personal contacts, a fact which explains her reluctance to see any increase in the number of ambassadors, because of their formal right to ask for personal interviews. But her correspondence with foreign sovereigns was copious, as was that of Prince Albert, and there is no reason to doubt that, so far as it was political, it was shown to the Prime Minister or Foreign Secretary, or both (y). There are many instances in her Letters of action taken after ministerial advice, as in the case of the unfortunate

(t) Letters, 3 s., i. 3, 18, 21 f., 25, 27, 29, 42, 55, 60.

(u) Letters, 3 s., iii. 251.

(y) Martin, Prince Consort, iv. 433.

(x) Stapylton, Canning, p. 433.

King of Naples and Sicily, when he sought aid from the attacks of Garibaldi and his sovereign (a), of her inability to aid the Queen Regent of Spain when assailed by the United States over Cuba (b), and her efforts to aid Greece when the disastrous war with Turkey took place in 1897 (c). Her famous snub to the German Emperor, when he suggested mediation in the South African War, ran (d): "The time for, and the terms of, peace must be left to our decision, and my country, which is suffering from so heavy a sacrifice of lives, will resist all interference" (e).

Edward VII. was busied in diplomatic activities in support of the policy of his Government, and interviews with foreign sovereigns were not rare. The rule that either a minister or a diplomatic representative should be present on these occasions was normal, but it did not negative occasional interviews without such support (f). Thus, on April 14th, 1904, at the British legation in Copenhagen, the King conversed for three-quarters of an hour with Alexander Isvolsky (g). But at all times the King was the agent of a ministerial policy which he cordially approved, not an independent actor in the diplomatic field. Naturally, the changed appearance of Europe has vitally reduced the possibility of the sovereign playing either by correspondence or by personal intercourse an important part in the conduct of foreign affairs.

(e) The Forms of and Responsibility for the King's Administrative Acts.

In a few cases the King acts without written record. He could still dissolve or prorogue Parliament in person; he could strike the name of a Privy Councillor out of the list at the

(a) Letters, I s., iii. 409, 412, 418

(b) Letters, 3 s., iii. 236, 240, on Gibraltar, 268, 289.

(c) Letters, 3 s., iii. 150 - 62.

(c) Letters, 3 s., iii.

(d) Letters, 3 s., iii. 509. (e) Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 203 ff.

(f) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 283-87. For Lord Lansdowne's diplomatic corrections of over-statement of views by the King, see Newton, pp. 308 ff. He obtained Mr Balfour's consent.

Privy Council Office (g); he could demand that a Secretary of State hand over his seals. But even for such personal acts ministers would be held responsible. Other acts he does in the presence of the Council, as when he admits members to that body or declares the President thereof (h).

Where written instruments are used, then care is taken to show who is responsible for each. The forms of these instruments are in the main derived from custom, and it is possibly open to dispute how far it is requisite by law that they should be used, except in those cases where there is statutory provision; thus, in the Government of India Act, 1935, the mode of appointment of the Governor-General and of the Commander-in-Chief is specified, and the legality of an appointment made otherwise could be tested in the Courts. The absence of a grant in proper form might be taken as invalidating it by the Courts.

(1) Orders in Council, whether prerogative or statutory, are not signed by the King, but he presides in Council, and his having done so and the making of the order are attested by the signature of the Clerk of the Council and by the seal. Responsibility naturally cannot rest with the councillors present, though their names are set out in the formal record of the making of the Order. Only three councillors are essential, and no one of these need be a minister. But the responsibility lies with the minister who requested the making of the Order by application to the Lord President for that purpose, and to make clear his responsibility the request for the making is signed by or on his behalf.

In certain cases the determination in Council may be embodied in a royal proclamation which bears the great seal of the realm. Proclamations are used for the prorogation (i), dissolution and summoning of Parliament, and for the declaration of war, peace, or neutrality, matters of prerogative, or (g) Procedure by Order in Council is now usual.

(h) See Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 59 ff.

(i) For an interesting case of an Order in Council for prorogation, see Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 760 f.

for declarations as to coinage, under the Coinage Acts, 1870 and 1920, or for a declaration of emergency under the Emergency Powers Act, 1920.

(2) Sign manual warrants are used for a considerable number of appointments, and are countersigned by the responsible minister. Those of stipendiary magistrates are countersigned by the Home Secretary, that of the Paymaster-General by two Lords of the Treasury. Such instruments are used for the pay warrant for the army and air force, or for the grant of pardons, and various other purposes.

But in many cases the warrant is essentially a preliminary step in the issue of instruments under the great seal. Thus the procedure in regard to the issue of letters patent requires the transmission to the King by the Crown Office through a responsible minister of a warrant to be signed and countersigned by a Secretary of State, the letters patent to be sealed, and a docket explaining the purport of the letters patent and stating by the orders of which Secretary of State they are prepared. The royal signature of the warrant gives authority to affix the great seal, but the King does not actually sign the letters patent. The responsibility rests with the Secretary of State, who countersigns. In the case of charters to towns or other corporate bodies an Order in Council is requisite to authorise the preparation of the warrant. This applies also to instruments for the government of colonies and protectorates, and an Order in Council in 1928 and 1936 authorised the issue of a warrant for the commission to the Counsellors of State to act during the royal illness.

Commissions under the sign manual and the signet are used for the appointment of Governors of colonies, Dominions (k), and of India, while officers in the army and air force receive their first commission under the sign manual and the appropriate secretarial seal.

A royal order, signed by the King and countersigned by two

(k) These are countersigned by Dominion Prime Ministers

Lords of the Treasury, authorises the release for expenditure of public money appropriated for the year by Parliament.

(3) Letters patent, bearing the great seal, are used for a large number of purposes: to authorise the opening of Parliament or assent to bills by commissioners; to put in commission the offices of Lord High Treasurer and Lord High Admiral; to constitute corporate bodies; to confer judgeships and other offices; to commission judges to hold circuits; to confer dignities such as peerages or baronetcies; to grant permission to a Dean and Chapter to elect a bishop, nominated by the King; and to authorise the making of canons by the Convocations. In most cases the authority for issue is a sign manual warrant duly countersigned, but in certain instances the Lord Chancellor acts without previous signification of the royal pleasure, as in the case of certain circuit commissions, commissions of the peace, and also in the case of writs of summonses to peers to attend Parliament on succeeding to the peerage, and certain judicial writs.

In certain cases the authority takes the form of an Order in Council, as in the case of proclamations. Writs for the election of members of Parliament are in practice issued on the strength of the proclamation summoning Parliament, but an Order in Council is also made directing the Lord Chancellor to issue them.

Instruments of full powers to negotiate and sign treaties and of ratification of treaties are issued under the great seal, authorised by a sign manual warrant countersigned by a Secretary of State. In the case of Dominion treaties, where the British instruments are still used as in Canada, Australia and New Zealand, the counter-signature is that of the Dominions Secretary, but his responsibility must be regarded as merely formal. In the case of Eire and the Union of South Africa, there is no British signature involved (l).

(l) See Constitution of Eire, Art. 29; Union Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act, 1934.

The forms above mentioned are the remnants of an elaborated system devised, and in part made statutory, in 1535, to secure that the King should not lightly make grants without having to secure the co-operation of a number of ministers, each of whom might find himself liable to punishment if Parliament should become hostile. Later the complication grew greater, as in part the temptation to collect fees added to complexities. But the forms were reduced under Queen Victoria, and the use of the privy seal disappeared wholly in 1884, when a sign manual warrant, countersigned by the Lord Chancellor, a Secretary of State, or two Lords of the Treasury became authority for the affixing to any document of the great seal, with a saving for any cases where the fiat, authority or direction of the Chancellor was sufficient.

It will be seen therefore that abundant precaution exists under which ministerial responsibility for each act of administration can be fixed. Behind, of course, the responsibility of each minister, stands that of the Cabinet, which, however, can in effect be relieved thereof by the resignation of the minister responsible (m), unless the opposition is able to enforce responsibility by defeating the ministry (n).

(m) E.g., Mr. Birrell in 1916, over Ireland (Spender, Lord Oxford, II. 213 f.); Col. Seely in 1914 (ibid. II. 44 f.), Mr. Montagu in 1922 (Fitzroy, Memoirs, II. 775—77).

(n) See Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), I. 62—70.

CHAPTER IX.

THE KING'S INFLUENCE ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

1. The Sources and Character of Royal Influence.

MANY causes unite to give the King a position of unique character and influence. In a country like Britain heredity counts for much, and the long lineage of the sovereign itself demands respect; even the least dependent mind is moved by the existence of so striking a link with the past. Moreover, the social prestige of the sovereign is very great, and the influence of "society" on political feeling is far from negligible. We have the constant experience that elevation to the House of Lords produces rapid alienation from Liberal (a) or Labour (b) sentiments even in a few years, while the next generation in the peerage is normally noted for a distinguished vehemence of Conservative thought.

But those who care for none of these things nevertheless support the monarch for an essential reason. He forms the ideal mode of hypostatising the State, and giving men a living person to whom they can pay the debt of loyalty which they owe the State. The appeal to "My King and my Country" is far stronger psychologically (c) than that of "my country" only to the vast majority of minds. If the imperial idea has a strong hold on Britain, it is largely due to the pageantry of the Jubilee celebrations of 1887 and 1897, and the imperial note was also struck in a most effective manner in the Jubilee of 1935 and the Coronation of 1937. Since the development of Dominion autonomy a new importance has more and more

(a) E.g., the late Lord Melchett.

(b) E.g., in 1938, Lords Ponsonby and Arnold.

(c) E.g., Herr Hitler has proved far more inspiring than the Reich; contrast Finer, Modern Govt., ii. 1126.

come to attach to the Crown, the fact that a common King and a common allegiance form the sole remaining link between the United Kingdom and the Dominions. The importance of this aspect of the Crown (d) is doubtless only in part appreciated by the masses of the people, but it adds a solid consideration in favour of the maintenance of monarchy. Nor is there any doubt of the value which attaches in the eyes of students of the constitution to an office which serves so well to provide the State with a formal and ceremonial head and saves it from all the turmoil and excitement almost inevitably involved in the office of President.

Moreover, the King is very wisely brought into immediate connection with many essential features of government and administration. He is the head of the army, the navy, and the air force, and of the civil service. The administration of justice is carried out in his name, and that fact acts much to the impressive character of judicial process; the judges are his judges. His head on the postage stamps and on the coinage is a perpetual reminder of his existence and a presentation of his personality. It is regarded as a distinction to hold an appointment from the King, as do Regius Professors and various other officials.

Further, the King is the fountain of honour, and in a country like Britain this aspect of the sovereign counts for very much, as could easily be appreciated by the attitude adopted by so many of his subjects on the occasion of the Jubilee celebrations of 1935 and the Coronation of 1937. Nor, though it is widely known that the prerogative of mercy is one essentially in the hands of the Home Secretary, it is unimportant that it is exercised in the name of the King, and that certain documents bear his signature, for the impression is given that remission of punishment reflects the gracious side of royalty.

The value of the Crown is enhanced in many minds by the readiness now shown by the sovereign and the rest of the royal family to take part in the ceremonials of all kinds which are more and more in favour with the emergence of the people from the grimmer toil and aversion to frivolity of the Victorian era. Much aid can be given in this way to the encouragement of worthy ends in education, in public health, and in varied forms of social service.

(d) Noted in 1902, on the Queen's death, by Mr. Balfour; Dugdale, i. 317.

But the essential factor in giving the King influence in matters political is the history of the monarchy. The King is descended from a long line of ancestors, who were all in greater or less degree concerned with State affairs, and the most dominant feature of modern British constitutional history is the reign of Queen Victoria and her tradition of service. It is perfectly true that for many years of her reign the Queen was far from popular, but the length of her reign and its unique character among the contemporary sovereignties of Europe, together with the efforts to encourage her people in the dreary days of the South African War, succeeded in establishing a tradition, since her death, greatly enhanced by the publication of her Letters, which reveal her incessant toil in the field of public affairs. Edward VII. has been accused of lack of aptitude or desire for business (e), but this impression seems, on the whole, unjust, having regard to the evidence available of his activities, mainly no doubt in the field of foreign affairs and defence, but also in other directions. George V., by common consent, set himself the duty of accomplishing a large amount of business. Edward VIII. seemed to take less seriously his royal obligations, and this fact, no doubt, explains the comparative indifference to his passing from the scene. The country obviously is pleased by the fact that George VI. has resumed his father's practice of devotion to duty.

Training in important public affairs from a comparatively early age and length of tenure of office plainly give ripe experience and render a sovereign as time goes on capable of playing mentor to ministers of less standing. Queen Victoria, in the latter years of her life, formed a living link with the Great Duke and with an epoch which was for some of her ministers merely history, and George V. had been King for thirteen years when he appointed Mr. Baldwin his Prime Minister. To judge from the evidence so far known, few ministers or ex-ministers have felt able to treat their sovereign with less than deference. That of Mr. Gladstone, despite his intellectual superiority, was real and profound, that of Mr. Disraeli must have been in substance sincere, and Lord Salisbury never took liberties with the Queen. Sir A. Fitzroy attests the ability of the King to hold his own against Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Bonar Law--despite the brusqueness of the latter on the one hand, and the Prime Minister on the other, and Mr. Asquith bears testimony to his firmness and appreciation of the different aspects of his own position. Moreover, it must be remembered that the Crown has access to non-ministerial sources of information of no slight value, which, added to personal experience, place the sovereign in a position to carry on arguments with even a very able minister. No doubt the distance between the Crown and the facts with which ministers have to deal is often great. Queen Victoria was patently in her old age unable to appreciate the spirit of the new times, as is seen in her attitude to Mr. J. Chamberlain (f) and his modernism, but kings move with the times, and it would be difficult to assert that George VI. is not by experience well equipped fully to understand those difficult social issues which represent the main internal problems of the realm. Foreign policies have always had a distinct fascination for the royal family, and if George V. was not so much concerned therewith as his father, that was due in part to the many other issues which held attention during his reign.

(e) Cf. Lord Ponsonby's criticisms, The Observer, July 1st, 1934, p. 7.

But the influence of the Crown is now wholly different from the ideal set by Lord Beaconsfield when, on September 25th, (f) Letters, 2 s., iii. 165, 290, 298, 522 ff., 550 ff., 554, 652.

1879 (g), "he still trusts that events will show that the sovereign of Great Britain is the arbitress of Europe," and responded to by the Queen on October 2nd (h) with the warning, "In the Queen's long experience, half measures, temporising with Cabinet and Parliament are no use. Don't make promises and declarations to satisfy Parliament, especially not when the honour and safety of the country and the great Empire and colonies belonging to it are concerned. They have hampered us in Zululand." A very different view is presented by Lord Grey (i), who points out that, in theory, constitutional monarchy might be shown to be improbable, the Crown must either be a check on democracy or be reduced to futility. The conditions for success he gives are plain. The monarchy must be hereditary; the sovereign must embody the traditions of the past as well as the practice of the present; his previous life must have trained him for the position. He must realise that the Crown is a democratic institution. Each ministry must have his confidence, support and goodwill. However much his influence may be used in favour of his personal opinion about policy or appointments, he must do nothing to weaken or undermine the position of ministers. In return the attitude must be one of respect as well as frankness; they must be careful to protect the monarchy and observe its forms. The performance by the sovereign of the duties and his observance of the limitations of the monarchy must be repaid by perfect loyalty to him. This, he suggests, was the attitude adopted from the first by George V.

The satisfactory evolution of the monarchy explains the failure of republicanism so far to achieve any real hold on British political opinion. Queen Victoria's reign saw for various reasons the development of a spirit of discontent during the period when, after the Prince Consort's death in 1861, she devoted herself to seclusion. In 1864 (k), in (g) Letters, 2 s., iii. 49; "dictatress," on p. 46.

(h) Letters, 2 s., iii. 50.

(i) Twenty-five Years, i. 208 f.

(k) 175 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 609. In May, 1879, Mr. Dillwyn's attack was on the prerogative rather than the Queen.

addition to growing unpopularity on this score, she was attacked for alleged partiality to Germany in the matter of Schleswig-Holstein. Attacks on her seclusion were marked in 1871 (l), when also complaint was made of her failure to spend on public entertainment her large civil list, and it was suggested that instead she was accumulating a private fortune. Sir C. Dilke, at Newcastle, on November 6th (m), uttered words on republicanism which the Queen never forgave, and Mr. Chamberlain commented on it to the effect that the republic must come, and at the rate at which we are moving it will come in our generation. In 1872 (n), Sir C. Dilke demanded an enquiry into the civil list, with the result that he was in a minority of 276 votes to two. But the prospect of office induced Dilke on March 13th, 1880 (o), to explain that, while, if the country were starting afresh like France after Sedan, a republican constitution would be the best, there was no justification in disturbing constitutional monarchy, a recantation which allowed him to become Under-Secretary of State. In 1872, Mr. Bradlaugh's Impeachment of the House of Brunswick attacked the pro-German attitude of the Queen, but did not actually plead for republicanism forthwith. In the next year the last republican conference met at Birmingham, and Mr. Chamberlain was absent no less than Mr. Bright. In 1874 Mr. Chamberlain welcomed the Prince and Princess of Wales to Birmingham. But in 1883 (p) he committed the faux pas, in contrasting the jubilee celebration of Mr. Bright with the recent coronation of the Czar, of saying “the representatives of royalty were absent . . . and nobody missed them.” The Queen (q) was angry with Mr. Gladstone for having induced her to accept such a minister, but he denied any lack of respect. Beyond some occasional grumbling at royal grants (r), which Mr.

(l) Hardie, Political Influence of Queen Victoria, pp. 205 ff.

(m) Gwynn and Tuckwell, Dilke, i. 139. He had opposed the grant of £30,000 as dowry for Princess Louise.

(n) Letters, 2 s., ii. 202.

(p) Garvin, Chamberlain, i. 395.

(r) Letters, 3 s., i. 384, 509, 514, 520.

(o) Gwynn and Tuckwell, i. 308.

(q) Letters, 2 s., iii. 431.

Gladstone supported as far as he possibly could, no serious dissatisfaction appeared later. There has been no substantial revival since of attack personally on the Crown. Incidental criticism (s) has been made, especially in respect of acceptance of Mr. MacDonald's change of front in 1931. But the constitutional character of royal action was even then supported by Lord Passfield, and Sir Stafford Cripps has carefully disclaimed the accusation of being hostile to constitutional monarchy. The fact is the more surprising because the abdication of Edward VIII. took place in circumstances which would have given an admirable opportunity for a pronouncement in favour of republicanism (u), if it had existed. As it was, the support of the disappearance of the Crown was voiced only by individual members of advanced Independent Labour views, and the Labour attitude in general was that of full acceptance of the Crown. The continuation of this attitude is doubtless dependent on the acceptance by the sovereign of the definition of his position summarised above from Lord Grey (x).

2. The Sovereign and Internal Affairs.

Much has already been said incidentally of the influence of Queen Victoria on the course of internal affairs. Her opinions were definitely Conservative, as was natural enough, but they were confirmed in this aspect by the association with Mr. Disraeli in the ministry of 1874—80, and from that date they never varied in substance. Mr. Gladstone, on the other hand, tended steadily towards more advanced democratic views, and, unlike the Queen, his interests were in domestic affairs rather than in foreign policy, to which naturally the (s) H. J. Laski, The Crisis and the Constitution, p. 34.

(t) What happened in 1931. A Record (Fabian Tract No. 237), p. 8

(u) December 11th, 1936: 403 to 5 votes (Mr. Maxton leading).

(x) The excitement on March, 1914, over the Curragh episode terminated with the formal assertion on March 25th by Mr. Asquith of the King's completely constitutional attitude throughout; see F. Legge, King George, i. 113 ff. Col Ward had raised the point on March 24th: "What we demand, Mr. Speaker, is the right to make laws absolutely without interference, either from King or Army."

Prince Consort had been specially attracted, and in which Mr. Disraeli had been deeply concerned together with the sovereign. It is fair also to note the much greater psychological appreciation of the Queen shown by Mr. Disraeli, whose sympathy with her in her bereavement was no doubt real, though his admiration for her intellectual capacities can hardly have been wholly sincere. Mr. Gladstone certainly erred in treating his sovereign as if she possessed his own intellectual subtlety, wide knowledge and enthusiasm (y), and his failure naturally raised a barrier between them which his, to modern eyes almost exaggerated, loyalty to the throne was powerless to remove. From the moment when, in 1862, Mr. Gladstone found his powers as a popular speaker in his northern tour, he was moving steadily to the Left, and his separation in 1865 from Oxford University set his development free. It is significant that in his old age he could realise the necessity of Home Rule, when Mr. Chamberlain destroyed the possibility of enduring achievement by shrinking from an intellectual advance foreign to his settled convictions of middle age. His susceptibility to new ideas was noted by Lord Rosebery in 1892 (z), and contrasts most interestingly with the imperviousness to such influences of the amiable Lord Granville (a).

The divergence of opinion between the Queen and Mr. Gladstone was no doubt at first connected with issues of a special kind, the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the controversy over the position of the Commander-in-Chief (b). The other bone of discord was significantly enough connected with the Premier's suggestion of further employment for the Prince of Wales and a royal residence in Ireland (c).

(y) L. Stachey, Queen Victoria, p. 215. See Hardie, Political Influence of Queen Victoria, pp. 46 ff.

(z) Esher, Journals, i. 163.

(a) Hardie, p. 127, n. 4. cites Mrs. Webb's contemptuous view, but Fitzmaurice's Life shows that he had some intelligence.

(b) Cf. Guedalla, i. 269, 274 f. The Queen was approached before the Cabinet was consulted.

(c) Guedalla, i. 351 ff., 359 ff., 368 ff., 374 ff., 381.

But it is clear from Viscount Gladstone's evidence (d), that the association between the Queen and Mr. Disraeli after 1874 was the essential cause of estrangement, though she had welcomed his victory as showing the existence of a strong Conservative party. The Queen was accused by Lady Ponsonby (e), in a letter to her husband as early as 1878, of having been converted by Mr. Disraeli into the belief in the idea of personal government (f).

But more serious damage to the relations of Premier and sovereign had been caused in 1871 over the issue of the royal determination at seclusion (g). General Grey, her Private Secretary, who was fully aware of the demands on her time, did not approve it, and encouraged Mr. Gladstone to press her to remain in England until the end of the session, but the threat of abdication resulted, and when the Premier visited Balmoral later he found her manner repellent. It was, of course, plain that this failure to take part in public affairs was a definite danger to the popularity of the throne: "Worse things may easily be imagined; but smaller and meaner cause for the decay of thrones cannot be conceived." Still, it was the Gladstonian opposition to the foreign policy of his rival which resulted in the attempt, already mentioned, to keep him out of the Premiership in 1880. But in addition to determination not to reverse that policy, the Queen declared, on April 8th (h), that there must be no democratic leaning, and Lord Hartington (i) tried to console her for the necessity of accepting Mr. Gladstone by the consideration that, if he had to form a ministry, it would have to be more Radical than that

(d) After Thirty Years, pp. 320 ff. Marriott's dissent (Queen Victoria, p. 145) is clearly invalid.

(e) Ponsonby, Mary Ponsonby, p. 144. In 1874, Mr. Disraeli begged for her advice in regard to a living for Dr. Hayman: Letters, 2 s., iii. 333.

(f) Cf. Lord Beaconsfield's hope to make her "arbitress of Europe" in 1879: Letters, 2 s., iii. 49.

(g) Guedalla, i. 66–70, 297 ff. No excuse can be found for the Queen's attitude, which was purely selfish. It was one of Mr. Disraeli's greatest feats that she stayed two days for the Czar's reception in 1874.

(h) Letter to Lady Ely, Letters, 2 s., iii. 47 f.

(i) Esher, Journals, i. 69.

of Mr. Gladstone (k). Compelled to accept Mr. Gladstone, she denied him any serious confidence. But the essential feature now became the royal opposition to any tampering with the constitution; the House of Lords now appeared to her essentially bound up with the monarchy and as necessary to keep the Commons from usurping power, a doctrine which ran wholly counter to the trend of opinion in her Premier's mind. Despite her aid to the Premier in 1884 in the matter of the franchise and redistribution, her own feeling was that the Premier was undermining the position of the Crown and Lords, and she deprecated his refusal to dissolve so as to obtain a verdict from the people on his franchise scheme. She seems, indeed, even to have contemplated forcing a dissolution on the issue. It is significant that Mr. Chamberlain fell under special displeasure on the score of his attitude to the Lords.

It was inevitable that on Home Rule there should be hopeless divergence of view. The Queen, however, took the very reasonable position of suggesting that the new policy had not the support of the majority of her subjects in the United Kingdom, and aimed at one time at creating a centre party under Lord Hartington with moderate Conservatives and Liberals (l). Later she aimed at detaching the Liberals, who favoured union, from the main body of Liberals, and in December, 1885, as we have seen (m), sought to induce Mr. Goschen, who disliked much Mr. Gladstone's eastern policy, to secure such a result. Her attitude now went so far as to endeavour to persuade the Duke of Roxburghe publicly to announce that his wife had refused the offer of the post of Mistress of the Robes on the score of opposition to the Irish policy of her Prime Minister (n). While he was in office she was sustained by the certainty of his defeat, and consulted Lord Salisbury as to whether in that event it would be con-

(k) Guedalla, i. 281. For Gladstone's refusal to allow the Lords to force a dissolution, see pp. 285 f.

(l) Gardiner, Harcourt, i. 552. Cf. her suggestion to the Duke of Argyll in 1884; Letters, 2 s., iii. 547.

(m) See p. 39, ante.

(n) Letters, 3 s., i. 51.

venient to the Conservatives if she allowed him to dissolve (o). Moreover, she was disappointed at his attitude towards the House of Lords, though he refused to accept Mr. Labouchere's demand for the abolition of the hereditary element. The Queen insisted on (1) the value of a body which was independent and need not, therefore, have to make pledges which proved undesirable to keep; (2) the fact that any attack on the Lords must affect the stability of the Crown and the Commons; and (3) the necessity of the Lords to combat Radical doctrines (p).

The Queen's hostility to the election of 1892 (q) and to the necessity of facing the "danger to the country, to Europe, to her vast Empire, which is involved in having all those great interests entrusted to the shaking hand of an old, wild and incomprehensible man of 82½" is painfully recorded (r), and her hostility to Home Rule was only modified by the certainty of its defeat in the Lords. Her concern to prevent any agitation against the Lords and the idea of forcing a dissolution to prevent this action whether by Mr. Gladstone or Lord Rosebery has already been mentioned.

Of Edward VII. it was not to be expected that he should be other than Conservative in essential outlook. Sir C. Dilke, in 1882 (s), pointed out that he was essentially a Conservative and even more of a jingo than his mother, though more under the influence of the last person with whom he had discussed a matter, and with more sense and more usage of the modern world than his mother. Even Sir S. Lee (t) admits that his Palmerstonian faith never completely reconciled him to the full claims of political democracy. This explains his hostility

(o) Letters, 3 s., i. 129.

(p) Guedalla, ii. 278 ff., 283 ff., 291 f., 298.

(q) For the sham character of royal audiences in 1892—94 see Guedalla, ii. 71; Gladstone, After Thirty Years, p. 341.

(r) Newton, Lansdowne, p. 100. Her desire for a six weeks close season for tourists in the Highlands being inserted in Bryce's Access to Mountains Bill of 1892 naturally did nothing to increase her welcome for a Liberal ministry; Letters, 3 s., ii. 112, 114 f.

(s) Gwynn and Tuckwell, i. 500.

(t) Edward VII., i. 518.

to Home Rule expressed vehemently in 1886 (u), and never it may safely be assumed relaxed. It is clear that in the matter of the House of Lords he was not in much sympathy with his ministry, but his power of accommodating himself to political necessities is shown in his readiness to consider that change might be requisite. His own plan for the reconstruction of the Lords was decidedly conservative, though not uninteresting. As set out to Lord Crewe on January 30th, 1910 (x), it preserved the hereditary principle unimpaired as regards the right to membership and to take part in the debates, but one hundred only, fifty on each side, chosen by the leaders of the Conservatives and Liberals in the House, would be able to vote. This would mean, if moderate men were chosen, that no Bill would be thrown out if it came strongly endorsed by the Commons on second reading, and that a reasonable compromise would be achieved on third reading. Lord Crewe made the obvious comment that the party leaders would be little likely to accept the duty of nominating moderate men.

The King, however, realised far more clearly than his mother the limits of royal resistance on matters in general, though he bitterly resented Mr. Lloyd George's attacks on the peerage. He seems clearly to have wished compromise by the opposition on the issue of education (y), but it does not appear that he cared for (z) the modest Bill to increase small holdings in Scotland, no doubt because opinion among the Scottish aristocracy was, as usual, unfavourable to anything which might affect sporting facilities or their complete control of their estates. Nor is there any evidence of his positive approval of the great social legislation which marked the first ministry really democratic in character, that of Mr. Asquith (a).

(u) Lee, i. 516.

(x) Lee, ii. 695 f.

(y) Lee, ii. 455—65, 658 f.

(z) Lee, ii. 476 f.

(a) The King was annoyed at Mr. Balfour's failure to tell him in advance of his proposal to attack (March 4th, 1903) Lord Rosebery's theory of a central party. Lee, ii. 50.

Of the attitude of George V. towards internal reforms nothing can be said positively. The impression from his attitude to the great issue of the House of Lords is that he accepted in the fullest sense, though not without natural misgivings, the duty of a constitutional King (b). This is the more to his credit, because of the grave impropriety of the efforts of Mr. Bonar Law, with the support of Mr. Chamberlain, and even of Mr. Balfour to throw upon him the onus of dismissing a ministry on the very problematic chance that he would, by an appeal to the country, secure a majority against the passing of the Parliament Bill, or later the Home Rule Bill (c). It is not suggested that either measure appealed to the King. The measure on Irish government, we now know, was framed to cover the whole of Ireland, not from conviction that this was proper, but from reasons of tactics, but this view does not appear to have been made clear at the inception to the King, nor is it clear that he would have been willing to agree to the promotion of a measure which it was not intended seriously to press forward in the vital matter of the inclusion of Ulster. In this regard it may fairly be said that the sovereign might have had serious grounds of complaint against the ministry for lack of candour to him and also to the electorate. No doubt, the exigencies of placating the Irish vote could be pleaded in palliation, but hardly as a valid excuse.

The movement for female suffrage aroused grave objection on the part of Edward VII., only natural in view of the discreditable tactics employed by those who promoted the movement (d), but it is not probable that the new sovereign found any difficulty in adapting himself either to the change of 1918 or the more far-reaching one of 1928. It is easy to imagine how Queen Victoria or even Edward VII. would have viewed the sweeping away in 1918 of the safeguards which guaranteed a minimum of political capacity in the electors.

(b) See p. 406, ante.

(c) For various articles urging royal intervention, see E. Legge, King George, i. 84 ff.

(d) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 467 f., 562 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 243.

3. The Sovereign and Foreign Policy.

Owing doubtless in large measure to her marriage to Prince Albert and to the influence of the King of the Belgians, Queen Victoria early manifested a deep interest in foreign issues. Marriages extended, in course of time, the sphere of her concern; the end of her reign saw the German Emperor her grandson, the Czar of Russia married to her granddaughter, while four other granddaughters were destined to become Queens in Greece, Rumania, Norway, and Spain. Mr. Gladstone has testified the value of the contacts which she established with other royalties, and there is no evidence to the contrary. Whether, of course, the existence of family connections is always desirable as between sovereigns may be doubted; if William II. had a considerable respect for his grandmother, and could acquiesce in very firm language as in the case of her rebuke when he suggested mediation in the South African War, his personal quarrels with Edward VII. (e), both before and after his accession to the throne, cannot be regarded as wholly unconnected with his growing hostility to Britain.

At first the Queen's relations with Lord Palmerston were cordial, but she was undoubtedly perturbed by his hostility to France in 1840—41, over the issue of the position of Mehemet Ali in Egypt (f), and King Leopold, who was most anxious to avoid war, certainly did everything he diplomatically could to alter her confidence in Palmerston. The result, no doubt, was her eventual cordiality to Louis Philippe and her acceptance of the failure of that sovereign to ratify the treaty between the five powers for suppression of the slave trade. Nor did she protest against the Ashburton Treaty (g) with the United States under which that nobleman, whose wife and property interests were largely American, made generous surrender of British territorial claims, while the miseries of African negroes were continued by the surrender of the right of visit, and France was thus encouraged to terminate the agreements of 1831 and 1833 for mutual right of search. The visit of the Queen and the Prince to France in 1843 was secured through the influence of the King of the Belgians (h). In the period of Palmerston's return to the Foreign Office, for a time the Queen worked wholeheartedly with him in the famous episode of the Spanish marriage plans (i), the result of which was to show complete dishonesty on the part of the French sovereign in the disgraceful marriage arranged for the young Queen of Spain in the hope of the ultimate reversion of the throne to Louis Philippe's son. The Queen spontaneously rebuked the King in severe terms.

(e) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 94 f., 117 ff.

(f) Bell, Palmerston, i. 306, 312 f., 319 f.

(g) Bell, i. 333—36.

Trouble arose, however, over Palmerston's drastic attitude towards Queen Maria of Portugal, who was oppressing her subjects and endeavouring to suppress the rebels at Oporto. Queen Victoria disliked his harshness to another Queen, and it was only with the aid of Lord John Russell that he was able in 1847 to secure promises of reforms from Maria which justified the grant of British help to subdue the insurgents, whose revolt became unjustifiable when concessions were made (k). He was able to carry the Queen and the Prince with him in 1847—48 in his policy of encouraging moderate reform in Italy, and the mission of Lord Minto (l) may have helped the grant of constitutions in Piedmont, Tuscany and the Papal States, though the project of establishing diplomatic relations with the Vatican foundered on the demand of the Lords, approved by Palmerston, that the envoy should not be a prelate. The subsequent events in Italy with the attack of Piedmont on Austria produced fundamental divergence of view, for an entente with the French Republic, established

(h) Bell, i. 338 f.

(i) Bell, i. 373 ff.; Letters, 1 s., i. 432, 485 ff.; ii. 31, 96—109.

(k) Bell, i. 391 ff.

(l) Bell, i. 413—17.

through the deposition of Louis Philippe, to drive Austria from Italy, was wholly repugnant to the Queen (m), who detested also the idea that peoples had the right by universal suffrage to decide their allegiance, though obviously this doctrine was essential to Palmerston's schemes for the creation of a strong Italian kingdom. Palmerston's habit of sending off despatches before she had seen them, and of altering some she had seen, irritated the Queen, who made no allowance for the necessity of greater haste than was possible if she held over drafts for long consideration, but Palmerston was, no doubt, to blame in considerable measure. Moreover, the British envoy at Madrid was summarily dismissed because of the terms of warnings to the ministry to practise moderation given by Palmerston (n). But a worse step was his reproof to Austria for the atrocious conduct of Marshal Radetzky in Milan, which arrived when Prince Schwartzenberg had just restored full power in Vienna, and resulted in the refusal of Austria to send an archduke to announce to Victoria the accession of Francis Joseph (o). The Queen was so angry that she allowed Lord Aberdeen (p) to explain to the Austrian chargé d'affaires that she quite understood the Austrian action. As she had vainly tried in September, 1848, to induce the Premier to move Palmerston from his post and to make him Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, it is possible to excuse her annoyance, though not the action of Lord Aberdeen. A worse faux pas on her minister's part was undoubtedly his connivance at the withdrawal from a government arsenal of guns, which a contractor desired to provide for the aid of the Sicilian rebels against the tyranny of Ferdinand II. (q). Lord Grey and his colleagues resented this error, and Lord John Russell wished to have an apology offered to the Neapolitan

(m) Letters, 1 s., ii. 186 f.; Bell, ii. 435.

(n) Bell, i. 439 f.

(o) Bell, i. 441—43.

(p) His "antiquated imbecility" was hinted at by Palmerston in revenge; 107 Parl. Deb. 3 s., 810.

(q) Bell, Palmerston, i. 443—45; Russell, Later Corr., i. 348 f.; Greville, Memoirs, vi. 276 f.

Government, and suggested that he might transfer him to Ireland with an English peerage and the Garter to soften the blow. But he declined to move, and all that was settled was to offer an apology if Ferdinand asked for it, while Palmerston won a distinct success in the Commons in his own defence. It is, however, characteristic of the unsatisfactory character of the whole position that Lord Ponsonby, the ambassador to Austria, was disloyal to his chief and working against him behind his back in communication with the royal entourage.

Differences of opinion were accentuated over the relations of Prussia and Denmark regarding Schleswig-Holstein (r), and the Queen, whose sympathies were Prussian, resented his success in securing a protocol by the five great powers, asserting the doctrine of the maintenance of the integrity of the Danish possessions. She equally disliked his intervention to urge the Turkish Government to refuse to surrender the Poles and Hungarians who escaped thither from the disgraceful treatment accorded to them by Russia and Austria, and his defence in September, 1849, of the Hungarian revolution as embodying the principles which had placed the Hanoverian dynasty on the throne (s). But, even so, it is amazing that the Queen had persuaded herself that all his measures on the Continent were in favour of a movement, anti-constitutional, anti-Protestant, and anti-English, and that Prince Albert could believe that, since Palmerston's return to power, Britain had not had a single success except perhaps in Switzerland, where the credit belonged to Stratford Canning (t). The removal of Palmerston was planned in 1850 (u), on the basis of his chief's going to the Upper House as Foreign Secretary, while Palmerston became Home Secretary and leader of the Commons, but this plan miscarried. Palmerston had unwisely supported a very dubious claim against the Greek Government by Don Pacifico, and the British fleet

(r) Bell, ii. 6 ff.

(s) Bell, ii. 17 ff.

(t) On this episode see Bell, i. 403—7.

(u) Letters, I s., ii. 235 f.; 260 ff.; Greville, vi. 316 ff., 335 ff.

was used to enforce surrender, which France helped to mediate. But Palmerston postponed notification of the settlement, so that another accord was made under coercion, and he so annoyed France that the recall of her envoy was mooted, and the French, Russian and Bavarian courts were not represented at the diplomatic celebration of the Queen's birthday (x). A combined effort was made by Lord Aberdeen, inspired by M. Guizot and Princess Lieven, to muster the protectionists to procure his fall through Lord Stanley's attack on June 17th in the Lords, but the defence of his foreign policy as a whole by Palmerston on June 25th won him a remarkable success against the hostility of the Crown and the doubts of the Cabinet, as well as the combined denunciations of the protectionists, Peelites and Manchester advocates of economic internationalism (x).

In August the Queen took the only step open to her, as the minister would not go and could not be dismissed without breaking up the Government, and defined the relations of the Crown and Foreign Secretary by a memorandum already alluded to (y). Palmerston accepted it, because inter alia to reject it and resign would have brought the Queen directly into politics. So little did he worry over it that, soon after, he despatched the apology to the Austrian Emperor for the assault made on the infamous General Haynau by brewery men when he visited Barclay's Brewery in London, without giving the Queen the chance of strengthening its terms (z). Nor could the resignation of the ministry in February, 1851, bring relief, for it was found impossible to secure an alternative Government (a), and Lord J. Russell could not get Palmerston to move to another office. At the end of October, the arrival of Kossuth in London, and his announcement of intention to visit the minister, procured an urgent royal command requested by the Premier that he should not do so, but in fact it was

(x) Bell, ii. 22—28.

(y) Letters, 1 s., ii. 264 f.

(z) Letters, 1 s., ii. 267; Martin, Prince Consort, ii. 266 f.

(a) Letters, 1 s., ii. 293 ff.

a Cabinet resolve, not based on the royal wishes, which induced the minister to accept the request to decline a visit. But at once he received delegations, who referred to the Emperors of Russia and Austria as "odious and detestable tyrants." The Queen was angry enough to be rude to Lady Palmerston, while, in revenge, the Emperor withheld much longer than usual the reception of the new British ambassador, a slight which maddened the Queen (b). On December 3rd he commented favourably to the French ambassador on Louis Napoleon's coup d'état (c). It seems that Lord John Russell had done the same thing, but the Cabinet decision was in favour of absolute neutrality, and the utterly incompetent British ambassador at Paris, who disliked Palmerston, communicated this view to the French Government, only to be told of the opinion of Palmerston. The ambassador was delighted to revenge himself and complained to the minister, who replied with a sufficient defence, but did not, before sending it, communicate the papers to the Queen, who had learned from Col. Phipps, brother of Lord Normanby, of his grievances. She was deeply angry, and Lord John Russell was, as he later admitted, hasty and precipitate enough to demand, on December 19th, his resignation. This decision was later approved by the Cabinet and delighted the Queen. She then, with the very disingenuous aid of Lord John Russell, secured the Foreign Secretaryship for Lord Granville, to the exclusion of Lord Clarendon, who denounced the desire of the Queen and the Prince to manage foreign policy through courtiers, even though they had "suffered such deep humiliation from Palmerston that they now fear an independent-minded man as a scalded dog does cold water" (d). Lord Granville, who had no great ability, was then required to draw up a programme of policy which after approval was to be adhered to. Palmerston's defence on February 3rd, 1852, lacked fire, partly perhaps because Lord J. Russell read a memorandum of August, 1850, which was an unexpected and rather discreditable blow. But on February 20th he defeated the weakened and discredited ministry on the militia issue.

(b) Letters, 1 s., ii. 283, 324—31.

(c) Letters, 1 s., ii. 334, 336 f., 338 f., 341 ff.; Bell, ii. 48—51; Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, iii. 433 ff.

(d) Maxwell, Clarendon, i. 334 ff.

In the Aberdeen Cabinet, as Home Secretary, Palmerston was still of vital importance in foreign affairs, winning support from Clarendon and Lord J. Russell, and in some measure unquestionably bearing responsibility for bringing on the war, but his attitude in Cabinet was praised as irreproachable. In 1853 a discreditable intrigue, approved by Lord Aberdeen, extruded Palmerston for a brief period from the Cabinet in view of his attitude towards reform, but the majority of the Cabinet compelled Lord Aberdeen and Lord J. Russell to readmit a man whose ability was such as to make both negligible in comparison (e). The Prince and the Queen, who had eagerly desired his fall, were soon to admire him as the driving power for effective conduct of war, for which Lord Aberdeen was plainly quite unfitted. When Lord J. Russell broke up the ministry by his resignation (January 23rd, 1855) over Mr. Roebuck's demand for a Parliamentary inquiry into the war in the Crimea, his appointment as Prime Minister became inevitable. Moreover, when he was defeated in 1857 as the result of his high-handed policy towards China in the matter of the lorcha Arrow (f), the Queen readily gave him a dissolution by which he rallied to his aid effectively the Liberals.

Nor had the Queen any hand in Lord Palmerston's defeat on February 19th, 1858, on the unfair accusation of yielding feebly to the French demand for measures to discourage plots in Britain against the Emperor. But she saved the new Government by allowing Mr. Disraeli to threaten a dissolution (g), which deterred the Radicals from voting against (e) Letters, 1 s., ii. 465 ff.; Bell, ii. 94—101.

(f) Bell, ii. 167 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, i. 225 ff.

(g) Letters, 1 s., iii. 283 ff., 290 ff.

the ministry for the error of Lord Ellenborough's published rebuke to Lord Canning for his policy as to Oudh, and after Palmerston became her Premier in 1859, difficulties were frequent, especially on Italian policy. The situation which resulted was remarkably unsatisfactory in a constitutional sense. The Queen and the Prince received information irregularly regarding Cabinet discussions, sought advice outside it, and used their knowledge to influence individual ministers to defeat the plans of the Prime Minister. On the other hand, Lord Palmerston and Lord J. Russell endeavoured to evade Cabinet control by committing the Government in speeches and in diplomatic interviews to policies not approved by the Cabinet, and by sending despatches which they knew the Cabinet would not accept. In July, 1859, Palmerston was eager for intervention on the side of France, but the Queen demanded a Cabinet decision, and this went against the Premier (July 24th), who now had Mr. Gladstone as well as Lord J. Russell in general sympathy. The Premier was determined to secure that the terms of the preliminary peace of Villafranca should not become definitive as regards the hegemony in an Italian federation promised to Austria or the return of the rulers of Modena and Tuscany to their territories. Much bitterness ensued, and Prince Albert was guilty of the injustice of accusing Palmerston of disregarding British interests for the sake of revenge on Austria and of inspiring pamphlets against himself and the "Coburg Influence." Gradually the policy of the Prime Minister proved effective, for Austria decided not to insist in using troops in central Italy, and thus the duchies were able to join Sardinia. The Queen and the Prince shared their Premier's objections to Napoleon's taking Savoy and Nice as the price of his services to Sardinia. But the Queen was shocked at his proposal to induce Austria to sell Venetia to Italy, and prevented the matter being mooted officially, though such action might have affected vitally the future of Austria by saving her from Italian hostility in 1866. She accepted, however, his refusal to help in any way the young King of Naples against Garibaldi and the Italian government (h).

In relations with the United States the action of the Prince Consort in softening the tone of the British despatch on the Trent affair is well known, but Palmerston was a willing party to the change, and the despatch was excused as the work of some fourteen hands (i). It seems that later in the struggle the Queen used her influence (k) against any project of recognition of the Confederate States, such as Mr. Gladstone would have liked (l), but Palmerston seems always to have realised the dangers of hasty action (m). On the other hand, her opposition to any co-operation with France on behalf of Polish rebels in 1863 was dictated by her devotion to German interests, and so in 1864 her steady hostility to any British intervention on behalf of the Danes. In February she used her influence to secure the dropping of the idea of sending a force to counter any Austrian naval action in the Baltic (n). Here, again, the Queen acted quite unconstitutionally; she used Lord Granville to perform his usual rather contemptible work of reporting on the views of the Cabinet and of stirring up its members to oppose their chief; she sent him correspondence with the Duke of Coburg (o), which she told him to show to any one of the Cabinet except Palmerston and Lord J. Russell, and she invited Lord Derby's support for the Cabinet views against those of her Premier (p). Palmerston, unable to make head against her intrigues, which earned severe comment from Lord Ellenborough in the Lords in May, could only reprove her for allowing her personal views to leak out (q). In fact she had no defence on that score, but her policy of acquiescence in the unjust treatment of Denmark (h) Letters, 1 s., iii. 352 ff.; Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 352 ff.; Bell, ii. 220 ff.

(i) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 294 f. (k) Gardiner, Harcourt, ii. 611.

(l) Morley, Gladstone, ii. 70 ff.; Bell, ii. 326—28.

(m) Bell, op. cit., ii. 314 ff., 326 ff.

(n) Letters, 2 s., i. 174.

(o) Fitzmaurice, Granville, i. 468.

(p) Letters, 2 s., i. 154.

(q) Ibid. 186.

prevailed. Yet it must not be thought that the Queen's influence was decisive. The essential fact throughout was that the majority of the Cabinet was against war, and that the Premier and Foreign Secretary had to support them only Lord Westbury and Lord Stanley of Alderley (r).

The Queen, however, changed her attitude somewhat when Prussia began to turn on Austria, and even urged an alliance with France and Austria to counter Prussia (s), but after Sadowa, she again thought of a liberal united Germany as an ally of Britain (t), a curious dream inherited from the Prince Consort. She advocated but in vain the giving of a definite pledge to Portugal against a Spanish attack in 1869 (u), and urged a thorough understanding with Germany against France from 1867 onwards, in the hope that this alliance would prevent hostilities by France. When war seemed imminent, she consented to write to the Count of Flanders (x) to induce his brother, Leopold of Hohenzollern, to withdraw his candidature for the throne of Spain, and after the defeat of France she tried (y) to induce the King of Prussia to moderate his terms of peace, but Bismarck's influence, of which she now became fully aware (z), prevented this, just as it had already negatived any possibility of the growth of her husband's ideal, a liberal Germany.

In 1876—78 (a) her initiative appears at its height in her hostility to Russia, whose action she believed instigated the Bulgarian massacres in order to render it difficult to protect the Turks. It is clear that on the whole she was working along the lines indicated by her Prime Minister, but it is also certain that once engaged in this course she proceeded to lengths embarrassing to her Premier, and used upon him the (r) Morley, ii. 90; Fitzmaurice, i. 462 ff.

(s) Letters, 2 s., i. 414.

(t) Ibid. 364.

(x) Ibid. ii. 28.

(z) Letters, 2 s., ii. 75 (Sir R. Morier's report).

(a) Seton-Watson, Disraeli, Gladstone, and the Eastern Question. The private mission of Col. Wellesley to the Czar was concealed from the Foreign Secretary.

(u) Ibid. 589—92.

(y) Ibid. 71.

technique of abdication which has impressed the reluctant Cabinet: “she cannot remain the sovereign of a country that is letting itself down to kiss the feet of the great barbarians” (b). The policy thus followed was clearly unwise especially when seen in perspective, but probably the villain of the piece was rather the Prime Minister than his mistress. Still she must have the credit, or otherwise, of holding her disbelief in “any permanent settlement of peace until we have fought and beaten the Russians” (c).

Later, the royal concern centred in the difficulty of preventing unfavourable results in relations (d) with Germany from the bitter quarrels between the Prince of Wales and William II., whose conduct to his mother gave just irritation to the aged Queen. The Empress Frederick had indeed an unfortunate life (e), as her husband succeeded his father in March, 1888, only to die in June, and for years Bismarck, who controlled the old King, had been hostile as well as her mother-in-law, the Empress Augusta. It was clearly unfortunate that feelings ran so high that the British ambassador was asked in 1892 (f) to discourage the Emperor’s annual visit to Cowes, and after his telegram to President Kruger after the Jameson raid, the Prince of Wales spoke of his most gratuitous act of unfriendliness, and said he should not come to Cowes (g). The Queen herself had told him in 1897 (h), with reference to his hostility to Greece, that “she was astonished and shocked at his violent language against the country where his sister (i) lives.”

Doubtless this personal feeling had something to do with the gradual recognition by the Queen of the desirability of keeping on good terms with Russia, as a means also of

(b) Life of Disraeli, ii. 1089 (January 10th, 1877); 1020 (June 27th); 1017 (June 14th); 1117 (February 9th, 1878).

(c) Letters, 2 s., ii. 625 (May 31st, 1878).

(d) Letters, 3 s., i. 441 (October 15th, 1878).

(e) Princess Catherine Radziwill, The Empress Frederick.

(f) Letters, 3 s., ii. 125.

(g) Letters, 3 s., iii. 7 f.

(h) Ibid. 138.

(i) Sophia, Queen of the Hellenes.

keeping France quiet. The fact that Germany behaved so badly was a factor in her acceptance without much indignation of the Russian occupation of Port Arthur: "It is I think important that the world at large should not have the impression that we will not let anyone but ourselves have anything, while at the same time we must secure our rights and influence" (k). Her efforts, however, were also devoted to trying to moderate the hostility of tone towards the Emperor in the British Press, and Sir Theodore Martin claims to have been successful even with the editor of Punch, whose caricatures "are not liked by the English public, but must have been very irritating to the Germans" (l). Hence it is not surprising that in the affair of Fashoda she concurred heartily indeed in the determination to secure the retirement of the French forces, but she was eager to aid in this being effected without discredit to France (m).Appealed to by the Queen of Spain in regard to the war with the United States, she recognised that Britain could do nothing to help, and the ministry shortly after was unfavourably impressed by Spain continuing to create works which threatened the fortress and the anchorage itself, so that Lord Salisbury was moved to suggest that it might be necessary to blockade Algeciras! The Queen wrote persuasively to the Queen Regent on the topic (n). She also accepted the arrangements with Germany of 1898 (o) regarding the possibility of the break up of the Portuguese Empire in Africa and Timor, which amounted to a virtual alliance as regards South Africa in her Premier's view. As Britain was still anxious for the integrity of the Portuguese dominions, it was not technically inconsistent, that in 1899, a fresh treaty with Portugal reaffirmed the obligations of the ancient (k) Letters, 3 s., iii. 238 f.

(l) Letters, 3 s., iii. 224.

(m) Letters, 3 s., iii. 305, 309.

(n) Letters, 3 s., iii. 289. British inaction in 1937—38 is interesting in contrast; Keith, The Crown, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 42, 177, 180.

(o) Letters, 3 s., iii. 263, 267 f. She agreed also to the Samoan surrender, 416 (1899).

treaties for the British protection of the Portuguese oversea possessions (p).

The most characteristic action of the Queen in these years was her determined effort to support Prince Alexander of Bulgaria, who had been appointed by agreement with Turkey Governor-General, also of Eastern Roumelia for five years. The hostility of the Czar secured his kidnapping by military conspirators on August 21st, 1886, and his enforced abdication. Public opinion in Europe was shocked, and the Prince was encouraged thereby to return in triumph to his capital. But Russian hostility became more marked, if possible, a wide conspiracy was engineered, and on September 7th the Prince resigned the throne. The Queen had secured efforts to induce the powers to oppose Russia, but following the lead of Prince Bismarck, they had yielded to Russian persuasion and had given no support to the Prince (q). Lord Salisbury explained to his sovereign the reasons for British inferiority in diplomatic battles (r). (1) Britain was sadly lacking in secret service money, £15,000 a year compared to the funds available in Russia. (2) The diplomatic service was inferior. Most who entered were not able, and promotion had to go by seniority. In 1878 he had promoted an officer to be Secretary of Embassy, and a motion of censure in the Commons was the result, which was indeed defeated, but it effectively prevented him from trying the experiment again. To remove a man before the retiring age was almost impossible for like reasons, as in the case of Sir R. Morier (s). (3) The lack of a land force capable of meeting even a second-class continental power prevented our diplomats from threatening, and this circumstance often deprived their words of advice of any weight. Other causes were “our precarious Governments, the necessity of adapting our foreign policy to the views of a Cabinet of fourteen or sixteen men, usually ignorant of it

(p) British Documents, i. 88 ff.; Garvin, Chamberlain, iii.

(q) Letters, 3 s., i. 4, 10, 12, 90, 96, 187, 189, 191 f., 199 f.

(r) Letters, 3 s., i. 193—96.

(s) Letters, 3 s., i. 355, 363; ii. 321, 325, 326.

and seldom united in their views!" and "our shifting foreign policy during the last ten years." Hence the failures of Her Majesty's servants in foreign affairs. The Queen, however, rather neatly reminded her sad Premier of Lord Beaconsfield's success in raising up the position of Great Britain from 1874 to 1880 in a marvellous manner, though "Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville pulled it down again during the five years of their mischievous and fatal misrule." She assured him that all Germany was boiling over with indignation and furious with the language of the so-called official organs of the German Government. Lord Salisbury, after the final resignation of the throne, had to insist that protests were not much use, since Bulgaria itself was divided in feeling, as a result of the belief that Russian hostility would be implacable while the Prince was on the throne, since Britain had no ally, and since British opinion itself was divided and, on account of distress, timid about the danger of war. As the Prince would not return, the Queen had to content herself with an abortive project to secure for him the hand of her granddaughter, Princess Viktoria of Prussia, but Bismarck intervened, and the Emperor negatived the project. In this case the Queen's reasons were plainly rather personal than public, but in her request to the Czar in 1875 (t) to discourage any idea of a preventive war by Germany against France, and in her anxiety in 1887 (u) lest the Boulangist movement might lead to hostilities, she showed her desire to promote peace, as later in the war between China and Japan (x). Her acceptance, on the other hand, of the necessity of the South African war was complete and wholehearted, and she distinguished herself by her firm refusal to countenance any idea of German mediation and her resolute assertion at the darkest moment of the war: "There is no one depressed in this house; we are not interested in the possibilities of defeat; they do no exist" (y).

(t) Letters, 2 s., ii. 391, 406; Lee, Edward VII., i. 350 n. 2.

(u) Letters, 3 s., i. 262.

(x) Letters, 3 s., ii. 418.

It will be seen even from this brief summary that the royal influence at no time could determine vitally the outlook of British policy. When all is said and done, ministers were the decisive element (z), but she could aid or hinder as the case might demand, and she unquestionably counted always for something, especially in the issue of intervention in favour of Denmark in 1863 -64 and in the Russo-Turkish question in 1876--78. She left a tradition of activity which was to be continued by Edward VII., though with the marked distinction that he was far more in his work the agent than the critic of ministers.

The new King came to the throne well equipped and informed. His mother had needlessly delayed letting him see the foreign despatches (a) and having access to knowledge of Cabinet decisions (b), but she had at last yielded, and he had, moreover, discussed matters with British ambassadors and ministers, and had corresponded with the Kaiser, the Czar and the King of Greece on public topics. He had learned to like France and to accept republicanism as his mother never did; his dislike of German policy dated at least from the treatment of Schleswig-Holstein and of his father-in-law, and he advocated an entente as early as the eve of the Franco-Prussian War. He had sympathised with his mother's dislike of Russia (c), and from the outset of his reign he was anxious to take a full share in foreign policy, to exercise his right to inform, to suggest and to criticise the suggestions of ministers. Nor were ministers unwilling to admit his right.

(y) Cf. Letters, 3 s., iii. 332 ff.

(z) For her assent as to the surrender of Heligoland, see Letters, 3 s., i. 549, 611 ff.

(a) Lord Rosebery did so in 1886 (Lee, i. 216 f.), Lord Salisbury modified the position.

(b) In some degree given by Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury, and Mr. Gladstone (Lee, i. 217).

(c) Lee, i. 421.

Mr. J. Chamberlain had already preached the desirability of terminating the isolation cherished by Lord Salisbury (d), and the King approved of a German entente. There were difficulties, for the Kaiser's reference to the Government as "unmitigated noodles" displeased the King as a similar attack on Lord Salisbury had offended Queen Victoria, though, according to Count Hatzfeldt, he admitted that his Premier was not likely to favour the project of closer relations with Germany (e). An effort to arrange a meeting with the Kaiser in August, 1901, showed the latter adroit to insinuate the necessity of Britain seeking an alliance, since Russia was seeking closer relations, and France and Germany were on warmer terms. No promise regarding Morocco, where Britain wished no alteration in the status quo, was forthcoming (f). Matters became worse when Mr. Chamberlain, now despairing of an accord, retorted hotly at Edinburgh on October 25th, 1901, to attacks on British war methods, to be counter-attacked by Count Metternich for his master and by the Imperial Chancellor (g). The loss of hope of an agreement resulted in royal support of the alliance of January 30th, 1902, with Japan, the King wisely dropping doubts of the wisdom of accord with a non-European race (h). On February 8th, the King explained to Baron von Eckardstein his doubts as to the attitude of Germany (i). The Times continued critical of Germany, and refused, in March, 1903, to modify its tone, despite royal suggestions (k). On the other hand, the Kaiser, after much consideration, solved a difficult point by declining to receive the Boer generals who visited Europe, while a counter compliment was paid in arranging that the 1st Royal Dragoons, of which the Kaiser was Hon. Colonel, should not leave England before the Kaiser had been given the opportunity to see them for which he had put in a claim (l).

(d) Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 254 ff.; Dugdale, Balfour, i. 249 ff.

(e) Lee, Edward VII. ii. 119 f.; Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 196 ff.

(f) Lee, ii. 128 ff. (g) Lee, ii. 132 ff.; Newton, pp. 203 ff.

(h) Lee, ii. 140 ff.; Newton, pp. 218 ff.

(i) Lee, ii. 146 n. 3.

(l) Lee, ii. 147—79.

As regards Persia, the King vainly pressed in 1901 for more effective resistance to Russian influence, and in November, 1902, "from patriotic motives and a high sense of duty, though with the greatest reluctance," gave way to the demand (m) that the Garter be bestowed on the Shah, to whom it had been promised, but to whom he had refused to give it in August. He remained, however, firm in limiting distribution of orders to his suite.

On February 8th, 1902, Mr. J. Chamberlain welcomed the desire of M. Cambon for an entente with France which he had vainly suggested to Lord Salisbury after the settlement in 1898 of the Fashoda affair (n). In accordance with the new outlook, the King gave no encouragement to the request of the Sultan of Morocco for aid against France in 1902, but only on enquiry from Lord Lansdowne in 1903 did he learn of the proposal of France for the partition of Morocco. In that year the King undertook a visit to Portugal, where he revitalised the ancient alliance (o), followed by one to Rome. There he forced Mr. Balfour, by steady insistence (p), to agree to his paying a "private and informal visit to the Vatican," which he did from the British Embassy, negativing the suggestion that he should start from the English College. In May he paid a most important visit to Paris, where he won from a reluctant people a cordial regard. In July, the President, with M. Delcassé, returned the visit, and steps were taken to perfect the promise of an entente. In the draft proposals two alterations (q) were made by royal suggestion; mention of a disclaimer of the intention to annex Egypt was omitted, and commercial equality in Morocco became "absolutely indispensable." The Cabinet was not as one regarding the surrender of the Los Islands, but the King approved. The treaty was (m) Lee, ii. 156. The honour had been given to the State in 1873 and to successive Sultans in 1856 and 1867, but was refused to the King of Siam. The King gave in only when it was clear that Lansdowne must resign, and Mr. Balfour suggested that the Cabinet would also resign; Newton, p. 238.

(n) Lee, ii. 217 ff. It has been alleged that Edward VII. disagreed with Lord Salisbury's foreign policy, but there is no evidence (E. Legge, King George, i. 50).

(o) Lee, ii. 222 ff.

(p) Lee, ii. 231 ff.

(q) Lee, ii. 246 ff.; Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 275 ff. .

signed on April 8th, but the King remonstrated that he had been treated with scant courtesy in that Mr. Balfour had announced that it must be approved by Parliament, because of the cession of territory and the financial payments involved (r). But the Premier stuck to the principle. In Parliament only Lord Rosebery criticised (s), on the score that the entente would lead to war, and it is significant that M. Delcassé, in 1906, explained to Sir Donald Wallace that Frenchmen had accepted the surrender of Egypt, to strengthen their claim to recover some day the lost provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. Germany showed for the moment, however, no resentment.

The King, who was in cordial accord with ministers in this issue, pleaded vainly (t) for intervention in the Macedonian revolt to help the rebels against Turkish misrule, but found Lord Lansdowne as lukewarm as Count Goluchowski, the Austrian-Hungarian foreign minister. No doubt, the reason was Austrian indifference. On August 31st, 1903, the King visited Francis Joseph, but neither then nor later does this intercourse seem to have effected any political result. He spent many months after in urging on his ministry the taking of stronger measures to bring the Porte to book, but Lord Lansdowne remained immobile (u). More successful was his renewal of cordial relations with Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, a Coburg, who had taken in 1887 the place of Prince Alexander, and whose policy the King, as late as 1903, stigmatised as "double-faced." But towards the new monarch in Serbia he remained hostile, for the massacre of King Alexander and Queen Draga on June 10th, 1903, deeply shocked him, and it was at his instance that diplomatic relations were broken off (x). Efforts by the Russian and Italian ambassadors, who claimed a special audience for the purpose in 1905, were met by a firm negative: "We should (r) Lee, ii. 252 f.

(s) Curiously enough Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 53, forgets this speech.

(t) Lee, ii. 258 f., ignored in Newton, pp. 301 ff.

(u) Lee, ii. 264—67.

(x) Lee, ii. 270 ff.

be obliged to shut up our businesses if we, the Kings, were to consider the assassinations of Kings as of no consequence at all." Only in 1906, after the leading regicides had been removed from office, in which the British minister would be brought into contact with them, did the King consent to the renewal of diplomatic relations. His feeling was, no doubt, strengthened by realisation that the new King knew all about the plot to destroy his predecessor. In the same spirit in 1903 the King refused any intercourse with the King of the Belgians, whose infamous government of the Congo is a dark page in the history of the Belgians, whose capital was adorned at the expense of incredible human sufferings (y).

With regard to Russia, the King's desire for an entente was sincere, but the war between that power and Japan created a difficult position in which the King desired to act so as to prevent any breach with Russia. Thus he approved, while Lord Lansdowne disapproved, the idea of Russia sending war vessels through the Dardanelles contrary to treaty (z). But he approved the British protests against the actual passage, and shared the general indignation at the incredible incompetence of the Russian fleet in its attack on October 21st on fishing vessels on the Dogger Bank (a). But he rather hastily decided not to press Russia unduly, and accepted the solution of an International Commission of Inquiry, which awarded £65,000 damages; the callous conduct of the Russian officers in making no effort to succour the victims of their panic was justly rewarded at the crushing disaster of Tsushima, which virtually ended the war. The King was then anxious to get into touch with Count Witte, Finance Minister of Russia, but that statesman, unlike Isvolsky, whose friendship the King had obtained at Copenhagen in 1904, did not believe in an entente, as he feared thence estrangement from Germany (b). On the other hand, the Japanese alliance was

(y) Lee, ii. 274—77; Keith, The Belgian Congo and the Berlin Act.

(z) Newton, pp. 314 f.; Lee, ii. 289 f.; cf. 297 f. on the illegal seizures of British ships.

(a) Newton, pp. 315 f.; Lee, ii. 301 ff.

(b) Lee, ii. 307 f.

renewed and strengthened in 1905 so as to cover British interests in India (c).

In 1905, however, the King was largely concerned with the question of the separation of Sweden and Norway and the selection of a sovereign for the latter. He was anxious to go rather further than the absolute neutrality favoured by Lord Lansdowne, and to aid the candidature of Prince Charles of Denmark, grandson of King Christian, who was married to his third daughter, Maud, and in this he was encouraged by the Hon. Alan Johnstone, minister at Copenhagen. The final result was as he desired, but his personal intervention was comparatively ineffective, though he certainly showed great consideration to all concerned, and tactfully secured the Garter for the Swedish Crown Prince, while he welcomed the new King of Norway to London in 1906, and there conferred on him the Garter. Mr. Johnstone received the K.C.V.O. in token of his personal services to the family (d).

With Germany, however, things went badly. The Kaiser determined, on his Chancellor's advice, to resist French penetration of Morocco, conceded by Britain in the treaty of 1904, and his landing at Tangier on March 31st, 1905, was followed by a proposal of the Sultan for an international conference to deal with the status of his realm. Britain was loyal to the compact, but M. Rouvier's Government yielded to an ultimatum and M. Delcassé had to go, an event unparalleled until Mr. Eden resigned in 1938 in deference to Signor Mussolini's demands. Moreover, on July 24th, the Kaiser, at Björkö, induced the feeble Czar to sign a treaty of alliance. But that was so obviously treachery to France that Lamsdorff, Witte and the Grand Duke Nicholas secured that it never was ratified, and the Conference on Tangier, 1906, at Algeciras, was a complete disappointment for the Kaiser, for British support secured excellent terms for France (e). In the same year the marriage of King Alfonso to Princess Victoria Eugenie of Battenberg strengthened relations with Spain, though Protestant feeling disliked the conversion of the Princess.

(c) Newton, pp. 327 f.

(d) Lee, ii. 315—26.

(e) Newton, pp. 329—45; Lee, ii. 336 ff.; Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 69 ff., 100 ff.

In the case of Greece, the King's interest was unbroken, ever since he had favoured the transfer of the Ionian Islands to that power as an inducement for it to accept the rule of his brother-in-law. In 1906 his influence was exerted to secure the retirement of Prince George from the office of High Commissioner, in which he had supported him so long as he remained popular. Later he agreed with Mr. Asquith on the merits of the union of Crete with Greece, but only in 1913 did it become possible to achieve this end.

In 1907, visits by the King to meet the King of Spain at Cartagena and to Italy were regarded as evidence of a desire to encircle Germany (f), and in fact the former visit was not unconnected with the conclusion of a treaty with France and Spain for the maintenance of the status quo in the Mediterranean, Sir C. Hardinge being in attendance as in 1906, when the Cretan issue was discussed. Later he visited the Kaiser, and discussed polities with Von Bülow, but not with the Kaiser. He followed this up by a visit to the Emperor Francis Joseph at Ischl, which again has been represented as aiming at driving a wedge between Germany and Austria, but clearly without truth (g). To dispel French uneasiness, he saw M. Clemenceau, President of the Council, immediately afterwards. The Kaiser's visit to Windsor, which took place in November, was marked by a seeming desire on his part to co-operate with France and Russia as well as Britain on the Baghdad railway issue, but the good effect of this demarche was at once ruined by the decision to strengthen the navy, and shortly after difficulties appeared in any rapprochement.

(f) Lee, ii. 538 ff.; Morel, Diplomacy Revealed, p. 74, gives Baron Greindl's suspicions.

(g) Lee, ii. 549 f.; Grey, Twenty-five Years, i. 150 f.

In the meantime the entente with Russia had been consummated (h). The King in this played a part in reconciling the Government of India (i) and the India Office to a project which they did not like. The failure to consult the ruler of Afghanistan was deliberately faced rather than cause delay or difficulty, and Persia was divided up into spheres of influence with singularly little consideration for her sovereignty or real interests. Nothing was done to injure Germany, but the close connection between Britain and Russia was inevitably resented. But the King's visit to Reval in June next year was marked by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's denunciation (k) of the Czar as a "common murderer" and "blood-stained creature," and the issue was debated on a Labour motion in the Commons, when the royal action was defended by ministers as their responsibility and accepted by a large majority. Unluckily the King, who had made a bad blunder in asking Mr. Asquith to go to Biarritz to be appointed Prime Minister, now made a more remarkable faux pas by withholding invitations from a royal garden party on June 20th from Mr. Keir Hardie, the Labour Party leader, Mr. Grayson, an independent, and Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, just elected at Stirling to succeed the late Premier. To do so was to bring himself into politics, and there was no answer to Mr. Keir Hardie's censure of him on this head. No excuse can be imagined except failing health and mental robustness for his mistake. It is, of course, open to doubt whether the ministry in furthering his visit was acting wisely, but it could plead that German hostility was driving it on to closer relations with Russia, whose completely unsound condition was probably not realised by the Government. A further blunder followed: the King at Reval created the Czar an Admiral of the Fleet without ministerial authority, and the Admiralty disliked the action, which it attributed to the mischievous activity of Sir J. Fisher. Obviously, however, a minister should have been in attendance, but Sir E. Grey was no believer in ministerial negotiations abroad. Unluckily his absence, and the fact that the King made no political accords with the Czar, had no effect in diminishing the growing suspicion in the mind of the Kaiser that the King was seeking to drive him into commencing a war.

(h) On the difficulty caused by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's mot (July 23rd, 1906), "La Duma est morte: vive la Duma," see Lee, ii. 569 f.; Grey, i. 154 f.

(i) Lee, ii. 569 f.; Grey, i. 163 f.; Halévy, Hist., 1905—15, pp. 341 ff.

(k) Lee, ii. 587 f.

Relations unfortunately were badly affected in March, 1908, by the revelation that the Kaiser had written spontaneously to Lord Tweedmouth (l) at the Admiralty disclaiming hostility to Britain in his new efforts to accelerate construction of a large fleet, and that Lord Tweedmouth had replied, divulging the British proposals for the estimates which, though decided in Cabinet had not been before the Commons, though this point did not then leak out. The incident was unwisely exploited by The Times against the ministry and the difficulties involved at home for the Kaiser, no doubt acerbated his feeling towards Britain. His ministers seem to have had some realisation of the advantages of an accord on naval construction, not so the Kaiser. Sir E. Grey suggested that the King at Cronberg, in August, might present a memorandum to the Kaiser on the topic, but the imperial attitude was such as to render this unwise. Then the publication in the Daily Telegraph of October 28th (m) of an interview with the Kaiser, really of December, 1907, both brought on the Kaiser a rebuke from his Chancellor and irritated him further into the indiscretion of giving next month an interview to an American journalist, W. B. Hale, in which he was hostile to Britain and the King. Efforts to suppress the interview succeeded, but enough was known to cause further bad feeling.

After failure at Cronberg the King proceeded to Ischl in August, 1908, and there had his last interview with Francis Joseph, while Sir C. Hardinge consulted with Baron von Aehrenthal. Both concealed from their interlocutors the fact that, following on the revolution in Turkey, due to the young Turks, it had been decided to annex Bosnia and Herzegovina, nominally under Turkish sovereignty, while Bulgaria would proclaim her independence. The news was broken to the King at Balmoral on October 5th, and was bitterly resented. For a time British diplomacy sought a conference to give sanction to the changes thus made in the Treaty of Berlin, but Isvolsky had promised acceptance of annexation in return for a promise of freedom for Russia, as regards passage of the Dardanelles, and Germany backed Austria against Serbia, which Russia could not support. Nothing but Sir E. Grey's firm resistance to a threat of war by Austria produced a comparatively satisfactory settlement, which, however, left it inevitable that Serbia should arm in preparation for the day when she could strike back with Russia no longer impotent to aid (n). Austria, for her part, was permanently estranged from Britain and France, as well as from Russia, and became subservient in large measure to the power of Germany. The King now for the first time realised the risk of war, and thus in April next raised the issue whether in framing the budget the Cabinet had taken into consideration the possible event of a European war.

(l) Lee, ii., 604 ff.; Esher, Journals, ii. 285 ff., whose letter in The Times started the trouble.

In all these activities the King plainly was acting in accord with ministers, and furthering policies which they desired him to undertake (o). It is clearly absurd (p) to impute to him personally any idea of attempting to isolate and encircle Germany, though von Bethmann-Hollweg accepted this doctrine and pronounced it to the Reichstag in 1915. British political conditions of the time would effectively have negatived any such deliberate policy, had it ever occurred to the King, and the sovereign's one real desire was patently to promote and maintain peace. His talents were unquestionably of the diplomatic character (q), not constructive, and his attitude to issues presented was never complex.

(n) Lee, ii. 626 ff.; Grey, ii. 172—94. Halévy, Hist., 1905—15, pp. 365 ff., who explains the German-French rapprochement in the treaty of February 9th, 1909, and the menace to the entente.

(o) See the very deliberate minimising of his action by Lansdowne's biographer, Newton, pp. 290 f., and by Lord Grey, i. 150 f.; Halévy, Hist., 1905—15, pp. 122, 410.

(p) Lee, ii. 729 ff.

To assess the comparative importance of his relations to foreign politics with that of his mother is difficult. It has been suggested (r) that his influence fell much below that of her predecessor, and that with the advance of democracy had passed away the power of the Crown to initiate or obstruct the foreign policy of the ministry. This seems to exaggerate the position. The Queen's power, for good or evil, could be exerted only when the Cabinet was divided, as under Lord Palmerston, or as auxiliary to a policy urged by her Prime Minister, as under Lord Beaconsfield. Her apparent control then of the Cabinet was after all no more than her reinforcement by her enthusiasm of the position of her Premier. In all cases where these factors were not present, her power was ineffective. Lord Salisbury did not change his policy at any time to meet her views, nor could Lord Rosebery help Siam against France, however strongly he disliked the actions of that power (s). The Queen, too, was handicapped in her utility by her refusal to pay State visits, and by her reluctance even to receive royalties. The King enjoyed being host and being guest, his range of friends was large, and he could learn much from them, while he maintained as active a correspondence with ambassadors and others as she ever did, and, unlike her, knew many of them intimately.

No doubt the activities of George V. in foreign issues were on a very different footing. Though the sovereign had followed foreign affairs under his father's régime, and had seen despatches (t), he had no desire to imitate his personal diplomacy, and his part therefore seems to have been reduced to that of a spectator and supporter of his ministers rather than that of an independent critic. His help was clearly (q) As recognised by Soveral; Esher, Journals, ii. 460.

(r) A. Cecil, Cambridge History of British Foreign Politics, iii. 615.

(s) Crewe, Rosebery, ii. 426.

(t) Lee, ii. 290, n. 1.

always available to ministers for formal purposes, such as his welcome to the representatives of the powers in 1913, when the problems of the Balkan States, due to their wars on Turkey, received for the moment a settlement. In the same year he visited Berlin, and the attempts to promote better relations produced an accord with Germany, pointing to her ultimate attainment of further African lands. In June he received M. Poincaré in London, and in May, 1914, paid a successful visit to Paris, with Sir E. Grey in attendance. Sir E. Grey, who had placed on record in November, 1912 (u), the informal relations with France regarding concerted defence, entered into an accord on a like basis with Russia, but explained that no alliance was possible. In the same way, at the critical moment when the issue of war was in the balance, it was impossible for the King to give an affirmative answer to the French President's enquiry if Britain would render aid. The invasion of Belgium and the King's appeal for aid changed the situation and enabled the King to give the necessary assurances. He had exerted his influence before the matter went too far to procure peace, but he had, inevitably, not such weight as would have attached to his father.

The King in the war clearly was equally helpful. He was quite unfairly, it seems (v), represented as reluctant for the stern treatment found necessary against Constantine of Greece, and was prepared for personal discussions of the possibility of peace with the King of Italy and the French President when the death of Francis Joseph opened up the possibility of negotiations with the new sovereign. He also offered an asylum in England to the Czar, though unhappily his benevolent project failed to achieve success, for reasons not wholly clear. In the actual work of treaty making, he does not appear to have taken any active part, nor, indeed, in the circumstances was that possible, but his grant of the Garter to Mr. A. Chamberlain after Locarno, in 1925, was an act of tactful recognition of a very considerable achievement which, if followed up, as at the time Mr. Lloyd George demanded, might have led to lasting appeasement. In the same spirit he presided over the opening of the London Conferences of 1930 and 1935—36 on disarmament.

(u) Twenty-five Years, i. 97 f.

(v) E. Legge, King George, i. 324.

No doubt recent events suggest that the control of foreign policy had passed more and more completely to the Prime Minister acting with the Foreign Secretary. It appears clear that the idea of securing a settlement in Ethiopia by the offer to transfer to that country a portion of Somaliland was determined upon without due regard either to the necessity of obtaining the royal approval in advance or to the principle that transfer of British rights of protectorate must require an Act of Parliament (x). The confused answers on this head of the Dominions Secretary are inconsistent with any adequate consideration in advance of the issue and submission to the King. The Hoare-Laval proposals for the settlement of the actual conflict between Italy and Ethiopia were plainly not duly brought before his notice before sanctioned by the Cabinet.

These proposals, and the complete change of British policy effected in March, 1938, in the decision to accept negotiations with Italy under an ultimatum, suggest the difficulty under which the Crown labours where action must be taken swiftly and where the ministry of the day has a large majority, however obtained. The Crown is in such cases reduced to the necessity of homologation (y) or of finding a new ministry to support refusal to accept the advice of the ministry. The responsibility of refusal of advice in such cases is so serious that it is difficult to see how the sovereign can take it. All that seems possible is pressure to induce the ministry in such a case, where it has to depart from the mandate which it sought when it was elected, to refer the issue to the electors, and the easy answer is to urge, as the Prime Minister urged on April 4th, that to plunge the country into the turmoil of an election was unjustifiable. Yet for a Government which in 1935 secured public support by a policy of upholding the League of Nations to decide to abandon that principle without a fresh mandate when challenged by a direct demand from the opposition is clearly a strong decision.

(x) Keith, Current Imperial and International Problems, 1935—36. pp. 139—41

(y) The treaty of April 16th, 1938, was no doubt duly thus accepted the King had seen Lord Perth before he went back to Rome to negotiate.

It is interesting to add that the question of the possibility of the sovereign having a foreign policy of his own was formally dealt with in the Commons on August 9th, 1917, as the outcome of a telegram sent to the German Emperor on August 10th, 1914, to the President of the United States containing statements made to Prince Henry of Prussia in relation to the foreign policy of Great Britain and her attitude to foreign powers by the King (z). Mr. Bonar Law had, naturally, no difficulty in stating that the rule of constitutional practice still obtained that the sovereign did not take independent action in foreign affairs, and that everything which passed between him and foreign ministers was known to his own ministers, and in asserting that the treatment of letters to and from foreign sovereigns, if they touched on politics, continued to be as under Queen Victoria. Such letters, as we have seen, can have only a limited importance now, but the King of Greece remains on cordial terms with the royal family, and at the outset of his restoration to the throne appeared ready to apply the principles of responsible government to his much harassed country, a decision, however, later seemingly altered, perhaps under the influence of the establishment of dictatorial rule in Rumania and Yugoslavia.

† The Sovereign and the Empire.

In Imperial affairs Queen Victoria had comparatively little interest, as indeed was not surprising in one whose mind was so occupied with the greater and more immediate affairs of (z) E. Legge, King George, i. 327—35; ii. 9 f.; Parl. Pap. Cd. 7860.

Europe. What she did was mainly formal. She selected the city of Ottawa as capital of the United Province of Canada, on Sir E. Head's advice, but her choice was not at first received with the necessary courtesy, and she showed little enthusiasm in regard to the creation of the Dominion of Canada. But for the caution of Lord Derby, who feared to irritate the United States, the style might have been kingdom and the symbolism of Empire which was to be created by Mr. Disraeli in securing for her the title of Empress of India might have been accelerated. The style of Commonwealth for Australia was not attractive to her, but Mr. J. Chamberlain (a) ingeniously explained that it was done so as to distinguish Australia from Canada. Her interest in the extension of the Empire seems to have been moderate, but she quite approved of the assumption of control of British New Guinea because of the probable gain to the natives in whose welfare she had a kindly interest. The name of Fiji she insisted on leaving unchanged with excellent taste. Nor did she refuse in 1897 to give membership of her Privy Council to eleven colonial premiers.

Naturally the Queen's keenest concern was with colonial issues when they impinged on foreign questions. On the subject of Egypt she had firm doctrines which led her somewhat far from the limitations of her position. The case against Britain then holding the Sudan (b) was unanswerable; the effort would have needed 20,000 men at great cost for no purpose of importance to Britain. But the decision to send Gordon to Khartoum was a bad blunder, though the Queen approved of it and Sir Evelyn Baring accepted it. The Queen was anxious throughout the year, and was bitterly indignant at the readiness of ministers to consent to fix a term for the British occupation of Egypt, though this was virtually necessitated by the attitude of Germany and

(a) Letters, 3 s., iii. 566. He had suggested mainly the Marquis of Lorne as Governor-General (p. 467). His views as to Governors (pp. 576 ff.) of the States received her approval.

(b) Letters, 2 s., iii. 454, 464 ff., 601 ff.

Austria as well as France. On the receipt of the news of Gordon's death, the Queen telegraphed en clair to Mr. Gladstone to say: "These news from Khartoum are frightful, and to think that all this might have been prevented and many precious lives saved by earlier action is too frightful" (c). It is not surprising that Mr. Gladstone would have resigned, had he found that this view had been made public by leakage in the telegraph department. The Queen had to allow him to be assured that there was no question of censure, but merely of regret, and none of publication, and so the storm subsided. Mr. Gladstone's reply to the Queen was singularly effective, and it is no answer to say, as Lord Cromer (d) did later, that the Nile expedition was sanctioned too late, because Mr. Gladstone was not persuaded early enough of its necessity. Clearly the advice given by Lord Cromer was erroneous; Mr. Gladstone realised that the true course of action was merely to protect Egypt, but this was not accepted there, and the decision to send Gordon should never have been agreed to. Thereafter she pressed unweariedly for the retention of so much of the Sudan as was possible, and urged, privately and unconstitutionally, Lord Wolseley (e) to threaten to resign, if necessary, to secure his own way. But ministers declined for ten reasons of weight to agree to that, while informing the Khedive that he must treat the Commander-in-Chief's authority as supreme. Lord Wolseley's policy at this juncture was an impossible one; he recognised that the connection with the Sudan should be severed, but he wished first of all to destroy the Mahdi and set up a native government. He recognised the danger of locking up British forces in the Sudan when they might be urgently needed for service against Russian or French aggression (f). At the same time, Russian action on the Afghan frontier, involving the defeat of an Afghan force at Penjdeh, compelled the Cabinet to decide

(c) Letters, 2 s., iii. 597 ff.

(d) Modern Egypt, ii. 17. Cf. Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 379 ff.

(e) Letters, 2 s., iii. 633.

(f) Letters, 2 s., iii. 630—32.

against any forward movement in the Sudan. The Queen vehemently demanded advance, but had to yield (g) to the force of the Cabinet position, which stressed the fact that the expedition would demand stronger forces than could be spared, that the Mahdi was not menacing Egypt, and that the forces in the Sudan could be safely withdrawn. The Queen stormed, but Lord Rosebery (h) pointed out that to send troops to attack the Mahdi would have been folly, that our distraction had enabled France to use menacing language as to Egypt such as Bismarck might address to France, that the danger in Afghanistan was serious, and that any other policy would not have been tolerated by Parliament or the country, so that the ministry could not resign, as Sir R. Peel did in 1845 (? 1846). It is significant that, after the resignation of the ministry, the same policy was preserved. The Queen, however, remained very interested, and in 1893 she again was active in demanding that another battalion should be sent to Egypt, as desired by Lord Cromer (i). She was, naturally, deeply gratified at the recovery of the Sudan in 1898, and proposed to Lord Salisbury, who readily accepted the suggestion, the offer of a peerage to Lord Kitchener (k).

In India her interest was keen after the transfer of the control, though it had existed before. The idea of taking a formal title was hinted at by Mr. Disraeli in 1859, and in 1873 was definitely put to Lord Granville, but nothing was then done. In 1876 the Bill was carried through the Commons at her request by Mr. Disraeli (l). It is clear that the opposition to the Bill was quite widespread, and that the Commons, though it accepted, did not welcome the measure, while Lord Hartington led a stout opposition to it in the Lords. Yet the Bill was sound in principle. It was in the interest of the Crown thus to stand out as definitely associated with India, and it helped (g) Letters, 2 s., iii. 634 ff.; Morley, Gladstone, iii. 50 f., 165 ff.

(h) Letters, 2 s., iii. 640—42.

(i) Letters, 3 s., ii. 208 ff.

(k) Letters, 3 s., iii. 292 ff.

(l) Letters, 2 s., ii. 438, 440; Fitzmaurice, Granville, ii. 159—63; Guedalla, i. 455 f.

to establish a personal relation between the Queen and the Indian princes. In Britain it, no doubt, was a prelude to the sentiment which stresses the position of the sovereign as the link of Empire.

The Queen Empress, as she was duly proclaimed at Delhi on January 1st, 1877, never forgot the consideration due to Indian princes. She had already manifested it in the case of the enquiry into the conduct of the Gaekwar of Baroda, who was ultimately deposed in 1875 after a semi-judicial enquiry of the fairest type. It is interesting to note that in 1859 she had expressed the view that this procedure might be adopted. The matter was of high importance, because the cessation under the new regime of the annexation of States to prevent misrule made it imperative to secure the people of the States against chronic misgovernment. She was always ready to show consideration to Indian princes, and was mild even as regards Holkar (m), whose insolence to the Government of India was marked, and urged that if a political agent were appointed, he should be a military man of high standing, very firm but courteous, "a superior person." It may be feared that the Queen was not aware that military men in India are often deficient in courtesy. She repeated later to Lord Curzon her views on the necessity of treating princes with due good manners, and he, himself, took the view (n) that princes should become stones in the building of Empire, but also honoured members of society. In one case her partiality outran judgment. The murder of Mr. Quinton and others in Manipur, while on an official mission to place on the throne a new Maharajah and to expel the author of the deposition of the previous Maharajah, demanded retribution, and, after careful consideration of her wishes, the Viceroy decided that the Senapati must be executed for his treason and murder. The Queen's protests were clearly quite unjustified, as was her gratuitous suggestion that Mr. Quinton acted with harshness and ignorance. Fortunately the Secretary of State, fortified by the Prime Minister, Lord Chancellor, and Cabinet, backed Lord Lansdowne loyally. This, however, is a clear case where, had she had the power, she would gravely have misused it, probably from relying on the biased advice of an Indian in her suite (o).

(m) Letters, 3 s., iii. 238, 386.

(n) Letters, 3 s., iii. 462, 510, 546, 624.

On the other hand, the Queen's interest in seeing that Indians received a generous share of decorations of the Orders of the Star of India and Indian Empire, was no doubt wise (p), and in 1897 she insisted on the presence of Indian troops at her Jubilee celebrations, while she started the practice of having Indian officers attached to her household, a proper recognition of India's place in the Empire. But she shared Conservative reluctance to contemplate any introduction of the elective principle in Indian government in 1889 (q), and even in 1892 a minimal step in this direction only was sanctioned.

On Afghanistan her outlook was affected by the fact that it formed part of the Russian question, and the decision of Mr. Gladstone to withdraw thence was the cause of the violent dispute on January 5th, 1881 (r), regarding the wording of the royal speech from the throne. She yielded only on clear intimation that to refuse would mean the revolutionary step of turning out the ministry on the eve of meeting Parliament, and complained that "she had never before been treated with such want of respect and consideration in the forty-three and a half years she had worn her thorny Crown." Yet the wisdom of the decision was shortly proved to the hilt. She was naturally not pleased at the necessity of yielding to Russia in some degree (s) over the Penjdeh incident, but Lord Salisbury was not able to advise any stronger measures than those of his predecessor, and the incident ended peacefully.

(o) Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 81—88; Viscount Cross was miserably feeble.

(p) Letters, 3 s., iii. 449 f., 562.

(q) Letters, 3 s., i. 524.

(r) See p. 389, ante.

(s) Letters, 2 s., iii. 634, 672; or the wisdom of Mr. Gladstone's policy, see Morley, iii. 183 ff.

enough. In the case of Chitral she was reluctant to agree to evacuation in 1895, but for once the Cabinet was unanimous (t). On the fall of the ministry the new Government reversed the policy, and the Queen was satisfied therewith.

One essential improvement in the government of India introduced on taking over direct control in 1858 earned her disapproval, the carrying out of the system of competitive recruitment for the civil service. But ministers could not give way in so important a matter, and the system was soon to be introduced in Britain (u). It is, on the other hand, pleasant to note that she insisted that her famous proclamation on taking over government should be animated by benevolence, generosity, and religious toleration, and should insist on the benefits to be derived from civilisation, and should stress the equality of Indians with other British subjects, though it must be admitted that fully sixty years were to pass before that principle was fully accepted (x).

The issue, however, of the Indian army (y) nearly led to the resignation of her Prime Minister. On February 5th, 1859, the Queen spontaneously warned Lord Derby of her firm determination "not to sanction, under any form, the creation of a British army distinct from that known at present as the army of the Crown. She would consider it dangerous to the maintenance of India, to the dependence of the Indian Empire on the mother country, and to her throne in these realms." Such an army would be free from the constitutional control of the Crown and Parliament, would be hostile to the regular army, and would give an unconstitutional amount of power and patronage to the Indian Council and Government. She also accused, in effect, her minister of systematically, in regard to India, placing her in a false position. He had not formed any judgment on the issue until he had heard the views of the Indian Army Commission and matured a judgment thereon. The Queen, however, had made up her mind, and he would thus be fettered in his advice, knowing that, if it took one form, it would not be accepted, and without sharing his knowledge with his colleagues he could not discuss properly the issues. The Queen then recognised that she had gone too far, and told Lord Derby he could consider her letter as not having been written, unless he preferred to have a communication in different terms which could be given to the Cabinet. It is clear that in her attitude she was in effect coming perilously near to the position of George III. in 1807, when he tried to restrict the freedom of the Grenville ministry, as regards constitutional advice on the issue of Roman Catholic emancipation. But too much importance must not be attached to action not pressed. The final settlement of the matter in 1861 did not create a distinct European army in India separate from the royal forces, and therefore coincided with her views, but how far she was responsible for the result is not recorded (z).

(t) Letters, 3 s., ii. 517, 562.

(u) Letters, 1 s., iii. 294 f.; for her objections to it in Britain see iii. 9; cf. Morley, i. 509 ff., 649 ff.; ii. 314 f.

(x) Letters, 1 s., iii. 298. (y) Letters, 1 s., iii. 282, 295, 302, 317—20.

To Edward VII. the affairs of the Empire were of interest, but his pre-occupation with foreign affairs, and the dangers of his absence from proximity to England, precluded in 1906 his acceptance of the urgent invitation of the Canadian Parliament to visit that country, and his acceptance of the invitation to visit Quebec for the tercentenary of 1908, though he sent his son (a). Curiously enough it required Lord Salisbury's authority to make him adhere to the promise of his mother that the Duke of York should open the first Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia (b), possibly he had then reason to suspect his health. On the subject of Chinese labour for the Transvaal the King took a strongly affirmative attitude, which may safely be attributed to the favour extended to the proposal by financial circles with access to the royal ear, and he resented strongly the decision (z) Keith, Const. Hist. of India, 1600—1935, pp. 188 f.

(a) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 521 f.

(b) Lee, ii. 17 f.

to reverse the policy, ignoring the fact that the election had been in part won by the Liberals on the cry of Chinese slavery (c). He was not enthusiastic on the grant of responsible government to the Transvaal, and resented the attitude of the Government to the vote of censure moved in the Commons on March 24th regarding the errors of his South African administration. With somewhat doubtful propriety he invited Lord Milner to Windsor, and spoke to him with impatience of the action of the Commons in virtually censuring him by 355 votes to 135 (d). He had the sense, however, despite Lord Milner's advice, which was freely tendered, to recognise that self-government must be conceded to the Transvaal (e), though he apparently did not accept the quite misleading assertion of Mr. Churchill that the change would favour British immigration. Mr. Churchill was then under the delusion that the carefully framed electorate delimitation would give a British majority, and that Sir R. Solomon would be Prime Minister, but the plan broke down, and General Botha took office. The King welcomed him to the Colonial Conference of 1907, though declining to make him an Honorary General in the army, an honour conceded in 1912 by George V. There followed on this visit the curious episode of the Cullinan diamond found in 1905, which the Boers desired to present to the King (f). The English element was stupidly hostile, the Cabinet wavered unaccountably, but in the end the King insisted that it must not throw the responsibility on him, and it then finally advised acceptance, in accord with the advice of Lord Selborne, and of the Prince of Wales. To the Union of 1909 he gave full sanction, provided that the position of the Native Territories, Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, and Swaziland was fully secured by the maintenance of direct British control, and he warmly consented to receive a Basutoland deputation on March 18th, 1909 (g). The subsequent choice of Mr. H. Gladstone to succeed Lord Selborne, and to be first Governor-General, he did not much like, but Mr. Asquith insisted, and the King yielded and gave a viscountcy to the new appointee.

(c) Lee, ii. 178—80, 479 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 166 f., 177 ff.

(d) Lee, ii. 480 ff. (e) Halévy, Hist., 1905—15, pp. 32 ff.

(f) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 487—90.

In 1909 he raised the question of due precautions for the safety of the Somaliland tribes, which would be affected by the decision to withdraw the British forces to the coast, and insisted on receiving fuller information from Lord Crewe than that given by his Prime Minister, but, here again, Mr. Asquith, fortified by the support of the Cabinet, remained firm, and the withdrawal, duly approved by the Commons, was carried out in 1910 (h). The policy was no doubt wise, having regard to the difficulties of maintaining peace, but happily it fell to be reversed under George V., when air power was sufficiently developed to render action against disturbers of the peace possible.

In Indian affairs the King was kept fully informed by Lord Curzon, who was most willing to report and to ask for approval. His attitude to the princes was that of his mother. He recognised the disadvantages of too frequent visits to Europe, but thought advice preferable to strict regulation (i), which, of course, involved a rather delicate assertion of the right of the paramount power. In the same spirit he refrained from permitting Lord Curzon to forbid the absence of the Gaekwar of Baroda from India during the visit of the Prince of Wales in 1905, a stupid piece of courtesy on the Gaekwar's part. Reference has already been made to his refusal to overrule his ministers on the issue of the announcement to be made at the Coronation Durbar of 1903. He stoutly supported his ministers in the refusal to sanction the terms arranged with Tibet of September 7th, 1904, in so far as they provided for the payment of the indemnity of £500,000 for a period of seventy-five years, and the occupation by Britain of the Chumbi Valley during that period. This was contrary not merely to promises given in Parliament, but to assurances to Russia, and Colonel Younghusband unquestionably far exceeded the authority given. But he generously secured him the grant of the K.C.I.E. in recognition of his success in the actual expedition (k). Nor was anything lacking in his courtesy to Lord Curzon on his arrival home on leave in 1904, after agreeing to stay two more years in India. But he could not support his demand for a stronger line in the negotiations with Habibullah of Afghanistan (l), who made no concession, and in 1905 obtained instead an increase of his subsidy to eighteen lakhs of rupees. His visit to India in 1907 resulted in no real improvement of relations, and he deeply resented the fact that he was ignored in the Anglo-Russian negotiations, though his position was safeguarded in the treaty concluded. He declined, however, to recognise that instrument, and allowed his subjects to aid the rebels in the Zakkha Khel and Mohmand insurrections in 1908. But the King deprecated any possibility of war. He always held that in these matters the Indian Government must take its line of action from Britain, thus agreeing with Lord Morley that there could not be separate foreign policies in India and Whitehall regarding the proposed entente with Russia.

(g) Lee, ii. 490—93, 699.

(i) Lee, ii. 364 f.

(h) Lee, ii. 44 n. 1.

In the great struggle between Lord Curzon and Lord Kitchener on the control of the Indian army, the King accepted the advice of his ministers (m). In thus giving the Commander-in-Chief the sole right of representing military matters in the Viceroy's Council, the ministry made a grave blunder in throwing on his shoulders excessive duties, which form the only excuse for the ghastly mismanagement of the Mesopotamian expedition (n), one of the most discreditable (k) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 369—71. Lord Midleton alleges that differences on foreign policy, rather than on army control, caused the breach between the Cabinet and Lord Curzon; Halévy, Hist., 1905—15, pp. 141 f.

(l) Lee, ii. 370—73; Dugdale, Balfour, i. 401 ff.

(m) Lee, ii. 375—80. Lord Kitchener in 1915 had to be forced to allow munitions to pass from his control, just as in India he had engrossed all power: Crewe in Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 595.

(n) Royal Commission Report, 1917; Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 294—96.

of British failures in the war. In persuading Lord Curzon to acquiesce on his return home instead of keeping the matter alive, the King undoubtedly helped to permit the continuation of a grave error. But Mr. Morley and the Liberal Government, which maintained the decision of their predecessors, must share blame for a very unfortunate error.

The King used more individual judgment in regard to the great problems which marked the Liberal tenure of office. He urged the necessity of control of the Press, as demanded by the Commander-in-Chief, and ultimately steps were taken in 1908 and 1910 to meet the situation (o). He also pressed for steps against sedition in England, and proceedings were instituted against the printer of the Indian Sociologist. On the other hand, the ministry declined to consider a grant of honours to general officers who had fought in the Indian Mutiny as likely to arouse annoyance. But the King shared in the wording of the message of November, 1908, on the fiftieth anniversary of the taking over of direct government (p).

On the issue of the addition of an Indian member to the Viceroy's Council, the King proved to hold exceptionally strong views (q), which ran counter to those quite unanimously held by the Cabinet, by the Viceroy, and by a majority of his Council. "At the last meeting of the Cabinet Council the Government were unanimous on the subject; the King has no other alternative but to give way much against his will. He, however, wishes it to be understood that he protests most strongly at this new departure." Yet both Lord Minto and Lord Morley stressed the fact that to refuse to put an Indian on the Council was to negative the royal proclamation of 1858 disclaiming any racial distinction. The King would not yield, and insisted that Mohammedans would resent a Hindu being given a place and that there was danger in an Indian taking part in the deliberations of the Council. No doubt in this view, then shared by his son, he was merely showing inability to advance with the times (r). But his continued interest in the position of the princes was shown in his insisting on the grant of the G.C.B. in diamonds to the Prime Minister of Nepal in 1908, and in seeking to secure a definite list of precedence for the princes, though that attempt was not wholly successful (s).

(o) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 381 f.

(p) Lee, ii. 750—52.

(q) Lord Curzon and Lord Lansdowne were hostile to the project.

To George V. fell the duty of sanctioning far wider developments in Indian government than those which had distressed his father. In 1917 the famous announcement by Mr. Montagu heralded the beginning of responsible government in India. The King, himself, by his presence at the Delhi Durbar of 1911 (t), had set a precedent of personal connection with India of high importance, and had announced far-reaching changes desired by ministers who were criticised for thus employing his authority to secure approval of the transfer of the capital of India from historic Calcutta to a new Delhi, and the virtual cancellation of the partition of Bengal, which was the most resented of all that Lord Curzon did in India. But the move of 1917 was far more important, and was followed up by the Government of India Act, 1919. He persuaded the Duke of Connaught to open the new Legislature of India, when he delivered a moving appeal for oblivion of the Amritsar massacre (u). The King also sent a message in 1921 for the inauguration of the Chamber of Princes (x), and issued a proclamation of December 23rd, 1919 (y), which forms a worthy continuation of the tradition of 1858 and 1908. His acceptance of the selection of Lord Reading in 1921 marked a definite break with the tradition of aristocratic Viceroys, and once more illustrated the fact that the King possessed a most remarkable and valuable faculty of adapting himself to the changes of social outlook of the day.

(r) Lee, ii. 382—89.

(s) Lee, ii. 389 f.; Esher, Journals, ii. 353, was hostile and killed the project as a whole.

(t) Keith, Const. Hist. of India, 1600—1935, pp. 232 ff.

(u) Keith, Speeches and Documents on Indian Policy, ii. 335 ff.

(x) Ibid. 332 ff.

(y) Ibid. 327 ff.

As regards the reform movement of 1930 the King proved helpful in regard to the activities of the Round Table Conference, which resulted in the scheme of Indian federation (z) under which the princes are given the opportunity of entering for certain purposes into a federation of India. At the same time in all matters in which they do not desire to accept federation their direct relations remain, and their character as such is marked by the fact that the Governor-General deals with the States not as such as in the past, but as representative of the Crown for its relations with the princes. This personal connection has become of great significance in the eyes of these rulers. At the same time the abandonment of the old system by which the Government of India was vested in the Secretary of State in Council and vested in the King, brings a new relationship into play, and secures that more completely than in the past the relations of the Crown to Indian government are assimilated to the ordinary type of relations as existing in regard to the Colonial Empire. Burma (a), now a separate possession, falls under the new office of Secretary of State for Burma, which is held conjointly with that for India.

Much more important in their bearing on the position of the King was the change effected in regard to the Dominions by the resolutions of the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930 and the Statute of Westminster. The decision that the Dominions stood on a footing of complete equality in internal and external affairs with the United Kingdom in 1926 was followed by the decision that the King could be directly advised by the Dominion ministries in respect of such acts as he might personally have to perform for them, and this decision was acted on by the Irish Free State and the Union of South Africa, and in the latter case formally arranged by the Status of the Union Act, 1934, and the Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act, 1934. Later, the Irish Free State in 1936, on the abdication of Edward VIII., deprived the King of all functions of internal concern and restricted him to those of external negotiation and appointment of diplomatic and consular agents only, a situation further emphasised in the Constitution of Eire, 1937 (b).

(z) Keith, Const. Hist. of India, 1600—1935, ch. x.; Letters on Imperial Relations, 1916—1935, pp. 189—244.

(a) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 114 ff.

It is clear that there is no real parallel between the relation of the King to his British ministers and that of his relation to the Dominion ministers. He cannot attempt to exercise any functions with regard to the latter except of formal action on formal advice. The point raised serious problems. If the King were asked to approve action by a Dominion incompatible with the unity of the Empire, would he be required to assent? In the case of the Union, and of Eire, action could now be taken without his personal intervention if desired, but in the case of the accrediting of an envoy to the King of Italy, Emperor of Ethiopia, for Eire in 1938, action by the King personally was requested by Mr. de Valera (c), disregarding the fact that the King was thus made a King with two faces, and he still recognised the Emperor of Ethiopia as de jure Emperor.

If, of course, the action proposed amounted to secession, the King might have to ask that he be excused performance, and that it be carried out by the Governor-General under local advice. But the issue does not immediately arise, though with the addition virtually of Canada to the Union, and to Eire as exponents of the doctrine of the right of neutrality, the question is not academic. The claim, of course, is tantamount to a claim of the right of secession formally held by the two latter Dominions.

Whether the King would be entitled or bound to oppose British ministers, if they advocated action which he knew would be resented by the Dominions, is open to discussion.

(b) Keith, The Dominions as Sovereign States (1938).

(c) The inconvenience was lessened by the British decision in the treaty of April 16th, 1938, to violate its obligations under Articles 10 and 20 of the League Covenant and to recognise the King of Italy as Emperor: see Keith, The Scotsman, April 19th, 1938.

The cause for such right of dissent is plainly not a strong one, for with the doctrine of equality the case for British deference to Dominion claims is greatly weakened. On the whole it seems inevitable that the sovereign must act on the advice of each group of ministers, so far as it is compatible with the maintenance of the existence of the Commonwealth, and nothing but the most serious divergence of action must be deemed incompatible. The tendency thus is for the Crown to become essentially divided, and for the relations between the Dominions and the United Kingdom to approach more nearly the conditions prevailing between Britain and Hanover before the separation of the Crowns in 1837. In the abdication crisis of 1936 both the Union and the Irish Free State asserted the doctrine that the Crown was divisible, and had in fact been divided, the reign of Edward VIII. ceasing on December 10th in the Union, of December 12th in the Free State, and on December 11th in the rest of the Empire (d).

In the case of the Irish Free State it must be remembered that the movement for separation was in part the result of the grave failure of Queen Victoria and Edward VII. to keep in touch with the people. It is deeply to the discredit of the Queen that, in the sixty-three years of her reign, she could spare less than five weeks for Ireland as compared with seven years for Scotland (e). Her visit in 1900 showed how much could be done by personal presence to win loyalty to the throne, and the fact of Fenian activities was wholly insufficient to excuse her consistent neglect. Nor would she consider the establishment of a royal residence there, nor press the Prince of Wales to make a practice of residing there for a fixed part of each year. Both Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone (f) would have favoured making the Prince her representative in Ireland, but royal jealousy prevented this being done, seconded, no doubt, by the Prince's unwillingness thus to hamper his enjoyment of English social life and foreign travel alike.

(d) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936—37, pp. 7—13.

(e) Lee, Queen Victoria, p. 565.

(f) On finding occupation for the Prince, see Guedalla, i. 320 f., 340 f., 351—70, 374—81, 383—85.

On ascending the throne the King, who had systematically neglected Ireland since his visit in 1885 (g), made some amends. He had already concluded that the political office of Lord Lieutenant might go in favour either of the appointment as the deputy of the King of a member of the royal family or of visits by the Prince of Wales from time to time. This scheme, which had not attracted Lord Salisbury, was rejected by Mr. Balfour on the advice of Mr. Lecky, a historian without any sense of vision, and an opportunity of conciliation was lost (h). But the King favoured the efforts of Mr. Wyndham at agrarian settlement, and approved Sir A. MacDonnell's appointment as Under-Secretary at Dublin Castle, with a position substantially more important than usual. He postponed a visit to 1903 for rather insufficient reasons, but was greeted with much cordiality, and equal success attended a visit in 1904. But in 1905 disaster greeted the amiable Mr. Wyndham, because his Under-Secretary, assuming his agreement, had gone too far in encouraging the prudent scheme of the Irish Reform Association, headed by Lord Dunraven, to encourage some measure of devolution in Ireland. The result was a dangerous revolt in Conservative ranks, the retirement of Mr. Wyndham on March 7th, and the retention of Sir A. MacDonnell, who never lost the King's confidence in office until in 1908 he retired with a peerage (i). In the meantime, in 1907, the King had paid a final visit to Ireland (k), which, however, was not wholly satisfactory, for Lord Aberdeen was not precisely a persona grata, and the theft of the jewels of (g) Lee, Edward VII., i. 245. The idea of an Irish residence was again negatived in 1889 by the Queen.

(h) Lee, ii. 161—63. Lord Salisbury is said even to have opposed the Queen's visit in 1900, but to have been overruled by her; E. Legge, King George, ii. 135 f.

(i) Lee, ii. 183 ff. Lansdowne is credited with part responsibility for MacDonnell's selection, Newton, pp. 498 ff. Wyndham is defended in his Life by Mackail and Wyndham, and some light is thrown by Mrs. Dugdale in Arthur James Balfour, i. 415 ff.; cf. Esher, Journals, ii. 76 f.

(k) Lee, ii. 472—74.

the Order of St. Patrick, which had just occurred, added to royal resentment.

As we have seen, the idea of providing for visits by the Prince of Wales to Ireland to represent his father had broken down, and it was not, therefore, given to George V. to influence, by personal contact with the people, the future of that country. The alarms and excursions of his early years of office precluded any attempt to establish his position in Ireland, and the outbreak of the rebellion presented the Government with a position whence no successful effort to extricate itself was ever made. It remains to the credit of the King that, whether on his own motion or not, he took the occasion of his visit to Belfast to inaugurate the opening of the first Parliament of Northern Ireland to make an appeal (l) for peace, which preluded the Irish negotiations of 1921 and the creation thereby of the Irish Free State.

5. The Sovereign and Defence.

Queen Victoria was never much interested in the navy, largely no doubt, not because she did not care for being on the sea, but because she had in army matters the advice of the Duke of Cambridge, who was absolutely conservative in all matters appertaining to the army. Moreover, it must be remembered that the Prince Consort was much more keenly interested from training and tradition in military than in naval issues. There was abundant opportunity of criticism of the defence preparations of Britain; the Queen could point out defects in numbers and equipment, and she gave a cachet to the efforts of Miss Florence Nightingale by royal favour. She came into conflict as often with Lord Palmerston, whom her husband accused of juvenile levity, because he was certain that he was in control of the Indian situation, and that neither France nor Russia could intervene (m). In fact she thought that he failed to realise the danger adequately, but he succeeded in giving Lord Canning support of 80,000 European troops within five months of the beginning of the disaster of the mutiny, and it was not found necessary to consider the offer of foreign troops, even by King Leopold.

(l) June 22nd; on July 29th Mr. Lloyd George asserted the falsity of current rumours and insisted on ministerial responsibility. Cf. p. 440, ante.

(m) Bell, Palmerston, ii. 172—75,

An interesting question arose when the abolition of army purchase (n) was determined upon. The idea that the Queen was seriously displeased with Mr. Gladstone on this issue cannot be maintained. She may not have been anxious for the change, but Lord Halifax is authority for her readiness to sign the necessary warrant revoking, under powers given by Act of 1809, the authority for purchase then accorded. The Queen merely required that a Cabinet minute should be recorded, and the requirement was just, because the ministry was, thus, by use of the royal authority—not prerogative—defeating the efforts of the House of Lords to prevent the abolition of a system, which had provided the army with inferior officers, and kept many able men out of it, or prevented their reaching high command. In 1873 (o) she pressed, with success, for the appointment of a commission to consider alleged grievances of officers under the new position. Her view, however, as regards the vital reforms of Mr. Cardwell, were totally unfavourable (p); she was certain that he was much disliked by the army, and wished him to be made Speaker, and in 1880, in making clear that she did not intend to have Lord Cardwell again at the War Office, she explained to her Premier, who had not been aware of it, that his plan had broken down (q). She demanded “no mere theorist, but someone who will act cordially and well with the Commander-in-Chief,” who could not forgive Mr. Cardwell for his firm assertion of the civil control of the army.

The Hartington Commission on National Defence of 1888—90 caused her deep indignation by its proposal to abolish her cousin’s office, and she stigmatised it as “this (n) Morley, Gladstone, ii. 361—65.

(p) Letters, 2 s., ii. 162.

(o) Letters, 2 s., ii. 252.

(q) Letters, 2 s., vi. 76, 80.

really abominable report, which she beyond measure is shocked should have emanated from a Conservative Government" (r). Sir H. Ponsonby was told that this step could not be allowed for one moment, and that he should take steps to prevent this being even discussed. The position of the Crown, in her view, demanded the right of direct communication with an immovable and non-political officer of high rank about the army. The command, it must be remembered, of the army signified to her a means of maintaining the prerogative of the Crown, and of combating the advance of democracy. Lord Wolseley (s) pointed out, with energy, that the Duke of Cambridge had successfully blocked reform for years, and urged that the Duke of Connaught should be appointed in his place, as the best means of preserving the office of Commander-in-Chief and securing essential reforms, while the Cabinet refused to give the Duke of Connaught the post of Adjutant-General, doubtless in large measure, because it was determined not to place him in a position in which he could claim reversion to the office of Commander-in-Chief, which it had decided to abolish when the Duke of Cambridge could be induced to resign. Not until 1895 (t) did the ministry through Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, induce the Queen to persuade her cousin to resign, and even then she was disappointed that her son was passed over. The office, in fact, though held by Lord Wolseley and Lord Roberts on a five years' tenure, disappeared under the re-organisation of 1904. Lord Esher had carefully paved the way for the royal acceptance of the proposal, by insisting that the King should not have in peace the competition in authority of a Commander-in-Chief (u).

The Queen's attitude towards generals in the field (x) was always cordial, and, as we have seen, she did her best to induce her ministry to follow Lord Wolseley's policy as

(r) Letters, 3 s., i. 582, 600.

(t) Letters, 3 s., ii. 517—22.

(x) But not even she could induce Lord Beaconsfield to receive at Hughenden Lord Chelmsford after his return from his chequered command in South Africa; Letters, 2 s., iii. 40.

(s) Letters, 3 s., i. 626, 627.

(u) Esher, Journals, i. 406 ff.

regards the Sudan. Her objections to the weakness of the army were impressed on Lord Beaconsfield in 1879 (y) as regards the operations in Zululand and Afghanistan, and in 1882 she so annoyed Mr. Gladstone in urging objections to the reduction of the army in Egypt that he described her action as intolerable: "It is my firm intention not to give in, so far as I am personally concerned, for a moment to proceedings almost as unconstitutional as they are irrational; though the unreasonableness of her ideas is indeed such that it is entitled to the palm in comparison with their other characteristics" (z). In March, 1885, she was most indignant with Lord Hartington and Mr. Gladstone, because of the despatch of a telegram to Lord Wolseley without her permission, and reminded the former of the rule of 1850 as regards Lord Palmerston (a). It was explained that her wishes were noted, but that the telegram in question did not bear the interpretation she had put on it. In the same spirit under a Conservative ministry she was anxious that the wishes of Lord Roberts should, as far as possible, be met. Her exertions in the South African war to show interest in her armies were continuous, and taken in conjunction with the fatigues of her visit to Ireland, undertaken in the same spirit, doubtless accelerated her death (b).

In naval matters the chief incident of her reign which illustrates her position was the amusing controversy over the question whether, when the Prince of Wales was present on the royal yacht with the fleet, the evening gun should be fired from his yacht or the flagship of the Admiral in command. The issue was settled amicably by an alteration in the Admiralty Instructions in 1873, but the questions raised were not uninteresting. Lord Halifax laid down the sound rule that the Prince of Wales eo nomine had no authority to exercise royal powers; else an ambitious Prince might in older days

(y) Letters, 2 s., iii. 43.

(z) Guedalla, ii. 43 (to Hartington, October 4th, 1882).

(a) Letters, 2 s., iii. 627 ff.

(b) Cf. Askwith, Lord James of Hereford, pp. 261 f.

have won strength against his sovereign, while Sir H. Ponsonby insisted that the Queen could never be made subject on her yacht to the Lords of the Admiralty. Mr. Gladstone may be pardoned for ostentatiously keeping out of this amusing squabble over The Fatal Gun, as a contemporary skit named it (c).

The vital question of the relative position of the Crown, ministers, and generals in the field regarding responsibility for conduct of war was raised in a very definite form at the close of her life. The Cabinet had authorised instructions to Lord Roberts virtually suggesting removal of Col. Broadwood and General Gatacre in view of their failure in avoiding Boer traps. To Lord Lansdowne (d) the Queen telegraphed that "Lord Roberts is the only judge of what is necessary, and must really not be interfered with by civilians at a distance who cannot judge the exact state of the case." With deepest respect Lord Salisbury submitted that under the constitution "the doctrine that the Cabinet have no control over a general in the field is not practicable. If they have no control, of course they have no responsibility. In the case, which is, of course, possible, that some grave evil were to result from the policy of the general, the Cabinet could not accept the responsibility of what had been done, or be under any obligation to defend him in Parliament; and in case Parliament took an adverse view, a condition of great embarrassment would result." In the instance under examination, Lord Roberts could make representations which would receive full consideration. In fact he relieved General Gatacre of his command.

Edward VII. was not merely in a position to take more personal interest in his army, but the existence of a tedious war at his accession rendered him especially anxious to press forward its conclusion by urging on the Government every effort to force a finish and full support for Lord Kitchener, despite the criticism of methods of barbarism used by the Liberal leader. He doubted the wisdom of sending Lord Kitchener to India, and only yielded to the urgent advice of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy combined (e). But he took a severe view of the indiscretion by which Sir Redvers Buller defended himself from attacks on his management of the Natal campaign on October 10th, 1901, and refused to disapprove of his compulsory retirement (f). He was influenced during this period by the advice of Sir T. Kelly-Kenny, and used his influence in 1901 to secure him the post of Adjutant-General in which he maintained him until the reorganisation of 1904, with which he was not in sympathy. He approved cordially the generous terms of peace on May 31st, 1902, and the grant to Lord Kitchener of a viscountcy, and rank as general, adding himself the Order of Merit (g), while a peerage in 1901 was conferred on Sir A. Milner.

(c) Ponsonby, Sidelights on Queen Victoria, pp. 1—45; Keith, The King and the Imperial Crown, pp. 384 ff.

(d) Letters, s. 3, iii. 525. The Queen concurred in Cabinet responsibility, but deprecated hasty suggestions to the General on the spot.

The Queen had deprecated any enquiry by a Royal Commission into the conduct—clearly unsatisfactory—of the war, and the King protested on June 13th, 1902, to the decision to appoint such a body. Lord Salisbury, however, insisted that he could not overrule his Cabinet as suggested, and that it was a question of honourable adherence to a pledge (h). His criticisms of defects were not spared, and Mr. Brodrick felt that he was unjustly suspected of taking upon himself too much authority, and disregarding the advice of the military side of the War Office and the Commander-in-Chief. It fell, however, to his successor, Mr. Arnold-Forster, to take up reform. The time was now ripe for the appointment by the Prime Minister, with the King's approval, and after consultation with the Secretary of State, of a committee composed of Lord Esher, Sir J. Fisher

(e) Lee, Edward VIII., ii. 81 ff.

(f) Ibid. ii. 84.

(g) Ibid. ii. 90.

(h) Ibid. ii. 91 f. The friction on this point, added to disagreements on honours and foreign affairs, may explain his resignation (July 11th, 1902). Cf. Lee, ii. 158 f.

and Sir G. Clarke to advise on the reconstruction of the War Office (i). Its report was of great importance, creating the Army Council, and thus abolishing the dualism between the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief of the former system. The King accepted it against the advice of Sir T. Kelly-Kenny. He also approved the appointment of the Duke of Connaught to the new post of Inspector-General, which pro forma was offered to Lord Roberts, who ceased to be Commander-in-Chief. The further changes made resulted in some friction with Mr. Arnold-Forster, who failed to send the draft Orders on Decentralisation early enough for his criticism, and the King was annoyed by his insistence, with the backing of the Army Council, that the age of entry to the Guards should not be reduced to eighteen years, and by his refusal of a special salute for the Inspector-General: "The Secretary of State for War is obstinate as a mule" (k). Mr. Arnold-Forster then adumbrated his well-known scheme of a dual form of army, long-service and short-service, for consideration by Parliament, the Government not being committed to any definite view. This scheme, as too nebulous, evoked the King's remark (l): "The King cannot withhold his consent from the proposals, which he is advised by the Cabinet to approve, but he cannot conceal his misgivings," though he accepted the proposals finally made by the ministry. On the question of the new pay warrant, he carried on a struggle with Army Council and Treasury, and refused to sign the new warrant until assured that no officer would suffer financial hardship under the new regulations (m). No doubt his insistence was aided by the fact that the ministry was in a very feeble position in the Commons. Moreover, his resistance was, no doubt, conditioned by a stupid error on the part of the minister, who on July 25th submitted for

(i) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), ii. 238, 247.

(k) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 190.

(l) Ibid. ii. 206. The minister's views are given fully in his wife's biography (pp. 224 ff.).

(m) Ibid. ii. 210 ff.

immediate sanction an amended army order regarding general officers commanding districts and accountants, through his Private Secretary. The King complained of his treatment to the Prime Minister, and Mr. Arnold-Forster apologised profusely for the oversight (n). His compliments on retirement were, no doubt, really meant.

Mr. Haldane's famous proposals regarding an expeditionary force and a territorial army were supported fully by the King (o), whose influence aided their acceptance by the Cabinet. He added to his services by summoning the Lord-Lieutenants to Buckingham Palace, where he asked their support for the county associations, which form an essential part (p) of the territorial scheme. The expeditionary force of 60,000 of pre-South African war times was raised to 160,000, yet army estimates were reduced by two millions in three years to spare funds for the navy. But the King was perturbed at the defects of the territorial artillery dwelt on by Lord Roberts, and, though Mr. Haldane produced much expert authority, the King still felt doubtful whether on mobilisation the artillery would be able to secure six months training before their services were required. Moreover, he became dubious of the policy of reducing the regular forces when the territorial army was still in the making, especially as the territorials only numbered 106,000 by the end of April 1908, and approached its strength of 300,000 two years later (q).

On the strength of the South African garrison the King's views were strong. In 1904 and 1905 he deprecated any reduction with dismay. In March 23rd, 1906, he stated that Mr. Haldane must "clearly understand that I cannot give my sanction to the reduction of any garrison in South Africa." He held that Gibraltar and Malta should be taken over by (n) Ibid. ii. 213 ff.

(o) Ibid. ii. 500 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1900--15, pp. 169 ff., Haldane, Before the War and Autobiography.

(p) Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), p. 328.

(q) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 502 ff.

the Admiralty and the forces in South Africa and Egypt increased, in view of the excellent training grounds they presented. Nothing could, however, be done, and on June 26th, 1908, the decision to reduce the South African garrison was duly taken by the Cabinet, a step denounced by the King as a "most ill-advised and dangerous proceeding." As always, he yielded to the Cabinet ruling (r).

His dislike of publicity in army scandals showed itself in 1906 and 1907, when he yielded, with reluctance, to the publication of details of the ragging in the Scots Guards and another episode, discreditable to military honour, but obviously certain to be exaggerated by rumour if the facts were concealed (s).

The navy also engaged his earnest attention, and throughout he supported the policy of Sir John Fisher in favour of the construction of Dreadnoughts, with economy in other directions, involving cutting down the forces available to show the flag overseas (t). Lord Charles Beresford's dislike of Sir J. Fisher and his policy led to his lending support to his critics, and after a prolonged struggle Lord C. Beresford was removed from command of the Channel Fleet on March 24th, 1909, but the latter made such serious allegations regarding the new distribution of the fleet, and other defects, that a committee was considered necessary, which found finally in favour of Sir J. Fisher's views (u). The navy estimates in 1909 caused general anxiety; the Admiralty wanted six, later eight, Dreadnoughts, while Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Harcourt, and Lord Morley demanded four only, on economic grounds (x). Ultimately, to the satisfaction of the King, eight were arranged for by some obscure process of reasoning, but not until after the

(r) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 484 f.

(s) Ibid. ii. 498 f.

(t) Ibid. ii. 330 ff. Cf. Churchill, World Crisis, 1911-14, pp. 121 ff.; Halévy, Hist. 1905-15, pp. 392 ff. In 1910 Sir J. Fisher retired with a peerage, as a result of his indiscretions.

(u) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 599 ff.; Bacon, Fisher, ii. ch. ii.

(x) Churchill, World Crisis, 1911-14, pp. 36 ff.; Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 252-54.

ministry had been severely weakened by constant attacks by the opposition, which, undoubtedly, had a distinct effect on lessening the Governmental majority in the election of January, 1910. Mr. Churchill has candidly admitted that on this occasion he was in the wrong, while in his turn, when transferred to the Admiralty in 1911, he found opposition to his own schemes.

In the Great War the part played by the King was mainly to encourage the forces by his unfailing interest, shared by the Queen, and other members of the royal family in their welfare. He, himself, visited the front and consulted with his Prime Minister (y) and others on the question of conscription, in a manner reminiscent of the days when the sovereign actually might sit in Cabinet to discuss questions with ministers; it is interesting to note that the Governor of Newfoundland contemporaneously sat in Council with ministers to devise means of aiding the Empire. The King also appealed to munition and other workers to give unsparingly of their time and efforts to aid their fellows at the front, and undoubtedly appeals from such a quarter had much greater results than those from employers or officials only. His effort to inculcate abstinence from intoxicating liquors for the duration of the war as a means of saving, and of securing a higher standard of efficiency, was unhappily but little followed, even in the highest ranks of society; a King can set fashions only when they are in substantial accord with the wishes of his people (z).

How far the King was consulted in the course of the war does not very distinctly appear; but we know that he approved the substitution of Sir D. Haig for Sir John French, and that he accorded to the latter firm support in his difficult task (a), and cheered him by much courtesy. It must be remembered that in vital issues, the sovereign was necessarily bound to accept the decision of the War Council, as in the resolution to get rid of Sir W. Robertson from the office of Chief of the General Staff and to substitute for him Sir Henry Wilson (b). It may be surmised that the Premier's refraining from deciding to supersede Sir D. Haig was essentially due not merely to the unpopularity of the step, but also to the undoubted reluctance of the King to accept so drastic an action. The wisdom of the Premier's restraint may be accepted, when it is remembered how great was the British leader's contribution (c) to the strategy of the decisive months of 1918, when the errors of March, largely due to the Prime Minister's unwise withholding of reinforcements (d), were counteracted effectively.

(y) Oxford, Memories and Reflections, ii. 109, 114 ff.

(z) Lloyd George, War Memoirs, i. 317 ff., 328 ff.

(a) Duff Cooper, Haig, ii. 14, 63, 69, 72, 129, 161, 392.

The limits of royal action may be noted again in 1934, when the ministry, which by that time had become conscious of the grave deficiencies of British strength in armaments, refrained from its original intention of re-arming, because by-elections seemed to show that any such policy was unpopular. It is difficult to suppose that the King could have been satisfied with an attitude which, as presented in the Commons on November 12th, and at Glasgow on November 18th, 1936, by Mr. Baldwin, seems to condemn the democracies to decisive inferiority to the Fascist powers (e). In the pre-war years the ministry seems to have been in full agreement with the King, that it lay with it, despite all Parliamentary difficulties, to secure that due preparation was made to meet the inevitable war.

6. The Sovereign and Ecclesiastical Policy.

To a generation in which ecclesiastical issues count for very little, the steadfast character of Queen Victoria's concern

(b) Duff Cooper, Haig, II. 223 ff.

(c) Cooper, op. cit., pp. 328 ff.

(d) Cooper, op. cit., II. 208 ff.; Sir W. Robertson, Soldiers and Statesmen, I. 296 ff.; Churchill, World Crisis, 1916-18, pp. 375 ff., Spender, Lord Oxford, II. 299 ff.

(e) Keith, The King, the Constitution, the Empire, and Foreign Affairs, 1936-37, p. 140.

comes curiously. But her views were simple and pertinaciously held. She believed herself head of the Church of England (f), and even Mr. Disraeli admitted that she was at least supreme governor in all spiritual and ecclesiastical causes, and she was an orthodox Protestant of her period, wholly opposed to extreme tendencies. Her aim was to maintain things unaltered, and she was therefore definitely hostile to anything which menaced it. Already in 1830 examination by the Bishops of London and Lincoln had shown that her mind was being duly trained in orthodoxy as then esteemed (g). Six years (h) later the King of the Belgians impressed on her the necessity of maintaining good relations with the Church, whose advice she accepted. Naturally she disliked the appearing of Romanising tendencies in Tracts for the Times, but Lord Melbourne, in and out of office, was not inclined to take the issue very seriously (i). But she was not bigoted, and warmly commended Sir R. Peel when he added to the endowment of the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth in 1845; while she would not use the resources of the Church in Ireland for this purpose, she held that the Roman Catholic clergy should be well and handsomely educated, and deplored the bigotry and blind passions shown by the Protestants (k).

In 1850 the papal brief establishing a Roman Catholic hierarchy in England raised much indignation in certain quarters, including Lord John Russell. The Queen approved of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill (l), in view of popular feeling, but deprecated abuse of the Roman Catholic religion as unchristian and unwise. She resented, however, quite as much the activity of the Tractarians and the Archbishop's failure to hold out any means by which the laity could protect themselves from Puseyite rituals. Lord Derby in 1852 (m) gave her assurances as desired of his intention to keep the (f) Letters, 2 s., ii. 348 f.

(g) Letters, 1 s., i. 16.

(h) Letters, 1 s., i. 72, 79.

(i) Letters, 1 s., i. 289, 373 f.

(k) Letters, 1 s., ii. 36 f., 75.

(l) Letters, 1 s., ii. 232, 279, 281, 283, 313 f. Cf. Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, iii. 366 f.

(m) Letters, 1 s., ii. 376 f.

Church Protestant against Puseyites and Romanisers, and Prince Albert raised the question of the constitution of a Church Assembly based on Diocesan Assemblies and Vestries exercising local legislative functions. In fact the regular meeting was revived in 1852.

In course of time, the growth of ritualistic practices developed so much that, she felt impelled to urge that steps be taken to deal with "dressings, bowings, &c., and everthing of that kind, and, above all, all attempts at confession," the bishops should seek power to put down "all these new and very dangerous as well as absurd practices," and should give permission, as on the Continent, for other Protestant ministers to preach in their churches (n). She expressed her fears to Mr. Gladstone, who promised careful consideration for any views as to legislation put forward by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and expressed his own regret at the appearance within the Church of persons who held views inconsistent with the tenets it professed (o). But it was left to Mr. Disraeli (p) to obey her commands and to carry the Public Worship Regulation Bill in 1874, which the Queen welcomed but which Mr. Gladstone ineffectively attacked. The measure, of course, failed entirely of its main purpose, to put down ritualism, in the public and royal view, but it afforded an effective ground for the Prime Minister to base a claim in 1879 (q) for the Queen's consent to grant preferment to Lord A. Compton, though a High Churchman, on the ground that he had worked assiduously to diminish the resentment against the Government felt by the High Churchmen, who pinned their faith to Mr. Gladstone, and so deserved promotion. With this formal and barren success in the war against ritualism, the Queen had to be content, save in so far as she could still influence opinion in the Church through the royal

(n) Letters, 2 s., ii. 290.

(o) Letters, 2 s., ii. 302, 306—8. Cf. Morley, Gladstone, ii. 514 ff., Gladstone, Gleanings, vi. 141.

(p) Letters, 2 s., ii. 298, 300, 329, 335, 339, 342, 347, 350 f.

(q) Letters, 2 s., iii. 51 f.

control of appointments. This applies to archbishops, bishops, deans, and some canons, while a number of livings valued at over £20 a year temp. Henry VIII. also fall to be filled by the Crown on the advice of the Prime Ministers.

It is not recorded how the Queen came to accept Lord John Russell's unfortunate promotion (r) of Dr. Hampden, which caused much unrest and an attempt to secure a judicial ruling as to his fitness. But with the passage of time her interest became strong. She claimed the Deanery of Windsor as a personal, not political, appointment, and proposed for it in 1882 Canon Connor. Mr. Gladstone, without waiving responsibility, settled the point by immediately recommending him, whereupon the Queen formally offered the post through Prince Leopold (s). On his death in 1883 the Queen consulted the Archbishop of Canterbury and proposed Randall Davidson, whom Mr. Gladstone accepted, though recognising that in view of the youth of the chosen prelate, some of his critics would be down upon him (t). The position is clear; the appointment rests on the Prime Minister's responsibility, though he will naturally defer to royal wishes in a matter so immediately interesting to the sovereign. The issue was more formally raised as regards the canonries, and Mr. Gladstone (u) stuck firmly to the status quo, which gives the responsibility to the Premier, though the sovereign can take the initiative if desired. This removes any anomaly.

In other cases the Queen was wont to rely on her ecclesiastic advisers, the successive Deans of Windsor. Dean Wellesley, who died in 1882, had for twenty-five years been in touch with ecclesiastical appointments. Lord Palmerston, in 1864 (x), commented on the Queen's request for more than one name to be submitted to her for the vacant deanery of (r) Letters, 1 s., i. 135 f., 139; Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), p. 73; Greville, Memoirs, 1837—52, iii. 109 f., 114—20.

(s) Letters, 2 s., iii. 341 f., 345 f.

(t) Letters, 2 s., iii. 421. For Mr. Gladstone's general views see Morley, ii. 430—33; iii. 95 ff. He ignored political views.

(u) Letters, 2 s., ii. 441; 3 s., i. 106 f.

(x) Letters, 2 s., i. 236, 240.

Westminster as a reference to irresponsible advisers, but he gave two names with a preference for Dr. Conway whom the Queen accepted, but with a strong defence of her right to consider the merits of persons recommended. This was, no doubt, in itself not an unsound doctrine, but illegitimate when it came to asking for the right to choose. Moderate views she demanded in her appointments from Lord Derby in 1852 (y), and she exercised strong pressure on Mr. Disraeli to conform to her wishes in matters ecclesiastical. Thus she obtained the appointment of Dr. Tait as Archbishop of Canterbury (z) despite his doubts, and caused much difficulty to her loyal Prime Minister, who had to warn her that the great mass of the Conservative party viewed with suspicion the Broad Church movement and that votes would be lost if the Government favoured it. Moreover, "if Church preferment were bestowed on some who are mentioned by name in your Majesty's confidential memorandum, a disruption of the Cabinet would inevitably take place" (a). He urged on her the grant of a canonry to S. Turner, son of the historian, Sharon Turner, a friend of his father, but found her most reluctant, and received a stern warning on the danger of Romanism and Popery and Atheism and Materialism. Mr. Disraeli, in fact, got himself into much trouble owing to finding a post for Dr. Duckworth, simply to please the Queen, who hoped it would benefit the health of Prince Leopold (b). She conceded with very bad grace her Premier's pleading for the Deanery of Chichester for Dr. Burgon (c), and, only after Canon Lightfoot had refused it, did she give that of Ripon, "under a narrow-minded diocesan, with an entirely sympathising clergy, and indeed laity," to Mr. Turner, who not surprisingly resigned the meagre post within a year (d). She (y) Letters, 1 s., ii. 376 f. Puseyites and Romanisers to be avoided.

(z) Letters, 2 s., i. 545 ff. For the selection of Dr. Benson in 1882 see iii. 381—86; Morley, Gladstone, iii. 95 ff.

(a) Letters, 2 s., ii. 370 f., 373 f.

(b) Letters, 2 s., ii. 373.

(c) Letters, 2 s., ii. 422.

(d) Letters, 2 s., ii. 374, 423, 433.

could not obtain from Mr. Disraeli a canonry for her friend, Charles Kingsley (e), but he received one in 1873, while Mr. Disraeli gave a canonry to Mr. Birch, who had been tutor to the Prince of Wales, who, it may be added, was by no means backward in urging favours for his friends (f).

Dr. Davidson adopted a moderate view of the royal position. He held that she should exercise the right to reject names, but should not advocate candidates for particular appointments, though she might mention to her Premier in general terms divines whom she deemed meet for promotion (g). Hence, as in the case of the translation of the Bishop of Exeter to London in 1885, there was a complex interaction of influences, the Dean, the Archbishop, Mr. Gladstone and the Queen all expressing views (h). In 1888, Lord Salisbury pressed Canon Liddon (i) for the see of Oxford on the Queen, explaining his reluctance to tender her unacceptable advice, but stressing the bad effect of the impression of the royal hostility. But the Dean cleverly secured a way out for the Queen on the score of the poor health of the candidate, whose place was taken by the solid erudition of Dr. Stubbs. Lord Salisbury, however, was quite firm against promoting the Dean himself, to Durham in 1889 (k), and refused him Winchester in 1890 (l), but gave him Rochester. He pointed out that the evangelicals had claims to preferment, which the Queen would not gratify, and that to promote Dr. Davidson, who was not yet known as preacher, author or parish priest, too rapidly would be a blunder, a view which the person criticised had the sense to accept as sound. The Queen again was hostile to Dr. Percival for Hereford (m), because of his association in her mind with the cause of Welsh Disestablishment, but Dr.

(e) Letters, 2 s., i. 519; ii. 248; Gladstone sacrificed Dr Miller, but refused to promote Mr. Phipps, brother of Sir C. Phipps, for very good reasons; ii. 281 f.

(f) Letters, 2 s., i. 520, 531.

(g) Bell, Randall Davidson, i. 164 f.

(h) Bell, i. 166 ff., 173 ff.

(i) Letters, 3 s., i. 428 ff.

(k) Letters, 3 s., i. 539 ff., 553 ff., 558 ff. Nor did he promote her protégé Bishop Barry.

(l) Letters, 3 s., i. 631 ff.

(m) Letters, 3 s., ii. 467—72.

Davidson pressed her to accept Lord Rosebery's strong recommendation as necessary to prevent it being thought that only one type of religious view appealed to her.

The influence of the Queen was not sufficient to secure Dr. Davidson preferment in 1896 to Canterbury, Dr. Temple being preferred (n), but after his appointment to be Archbishop his influence was maintained in effect. He was regularly consulted, would explain the special nature of the vacant see, and suggest names, whence a choice would be made after full consultation between him and his sovereign. It appears that, though he did not always secure the preferment of the candidate whom he favoured, no appointment which he actually disapproved was made. Edward VII. was seemingly responsible for the appointment to London of Dr. Winnington Ingram, an appointment which had considerable effect on the growth of irregularities in that diocese (o). After 1906 (p), however, his interest in the matter waned, but in 1902, he negatived the suggestions of the Bishop of Winchester that colonial bishops might be made canons without dropping the episcopal style and habit, and that royal chaplains should no longer be required to resign on being made suffragan bishops or deans, a pluralism which he deemed unfair to other clergy. Mr. Asquith (q) was especially careful in his ecclesiastical patronage, and always took his own decisions for submission to the King. His own outlook was that of an old-fashioned Protestantism, without leanings to the High Church.

Of later appointments, no doubt, the most remarkable are those of Dr. Barnes, as Bishop of Birmingham, which was (n) Letters, 3 s., iii. 94 ff., 100, 104, 110.

(o) Lee, n. 52.

(p) Lee, ii. 53. He tried to persuade Lord Salisbury to promote to the Deanery of Peterborough his son or his brother-in-law, Canon Alderson—but, perhaps, because of his very generous treatment of his relatives in his ministry in 1900 (Garvin, Chamberlain, iii. 614; 88 Parl. Deb. 4 s., 395, “The Hotel Cecil Unlimited”) he refused.

(q) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 378 ff. The present Archbishop of Canterbury admittedly exercises a wide influence on episcopal appointments, but there is on foot a movement to secure directly for the Church some degree of control.

made by a Labour Prime Minister, and of Dr. Temple as Archbishop of York.

(2) To the Church of Scotland the attitude of Queen Victoria was very interesting. It was never forgotten by her that the sovereign has a double duty, to support the Church of England, in England, and to support the Church of Scotland when in Scotland. Fortunately for her, she was deeply attached to the Church, which she regarded as the real and true stronghold of Protestantism (r), and she found in Dr. Norman Maclean a typical exponent of its spirit, just as in Dr. Davidson she had a polished diplomatic adviser in the far more difficult questions of the Church in England. She was still young when the great disruption of 1843 took place, and she had to approve the decision of Sir R. Peel (s) that the Government could not accept the claim of the Church to override the right of patronage given by the Act of Anne, and only in 1874 was that Act, which was probably contrary to the Act of Union, repealed. She claimed to be head of the Church (t), though, of course, as the Lord Advocate pointed out, no such claim was admitted by the Church, but that claim was not meant in any serious sense. While patronage lasted the Crown livings were dealt with, with special care.

The idea of disestablishing the Church of Scotland was wholly foreign to her, and Lord Rosebery (u) found himself exposed to a complete refusal to contemplate such action, though it was alluded to in the speech from the throne for 1894. She reminded him of the coronation oath, and certainly it would have been very difficult to ask a Queen, who was perfectly sincere in her religious convictions, to accept a Bill contrary to that oath. The precedent of the irreligious and generally worthless George IV. and Roman Catholic emancipation was far from a cogent argument. Luckily the (r) Letters, 2 s., iii. 47.

(s) Letters, 1 s., i. 447 f. 450.

(t) Letters, 2 s., ii. 349. She deprecated any proselytising by the Episcopal Church, and the tendency of Scots upper class families to join that church of dissenters.

(u) Letters, 3 s., ii. 452 f.

issue never became urgent in her lifetime, and in 1921 an Act was duly passed which opened the way to the reunion of the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church in a much larger and very representative body. It is significant of the good will of George V. to the change that, before it was consummated, he authorised his High Commissioner to abandon the formality of claiming the right to dissolve in the royal name the General Assembly contemporaneously with its dissolution by the Moderator of the Church.

(3) To Roman Catholics the Queen was kindly disposed, but her consent to the disestablishment of the Irish Church was rather due to her slightness of interest in Ireland than to conviction of the case for the Roman Catholics. Edward VII. showed the effect of the development of religious toleration by his objections to the terms of the declaration, which he was required by statute to make on accession, repudiating the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the adoration of the Virgin Mary, and the sacrifice of the mass as used in the Church of Rome (x). But his anxiety to induce ministers to act was foiled by the stubborn resistance of Lord Halsbury, who published, without consulting the King, the report of a committee of peers set up to advise as to changes. The King disliked both failure to consult and the terms of the report, and, when the Government produced a Bill, based on the report, and passed it through the Lords, his attitude, no doubt, helped to induce the ministry to let the matter stand over. But, after George V. had had to take the oath in the old form, the new ministry in 1910 reduced the royal obligation to that of a declaration that the sovereign was a true Protestant by the Accession Declaration Act (y).

The King showed also his desire to treat with respect the head of the religion professed by so many of his subjects, and therefore secured ministerial approval for a private visit to the Pope when visiting Rome as above mentioned (z). But in (x) Lee, Edward VII., ii.

(y) Anson, The Crown (ed. Keith), i. 267 n. 3.

(z) See p. 484, ante.

1908 (a) an episode occurred, very embarrassing alike to ministers and the sovereign, out of the proposed public procession of the Holy Sacrament on September 13th, as "an act of reparation for the Reformation." The Protestant Alliance and the Church Association naturally protested and addressed the sovereign, who heard nothing from the Home Secretary, or at first Mr. Asquith. Cardinal Bourne was induced, through Lord Ripon, to omit the host and the vestments from the procession which took place. The King rightly rebuked the Home Secretary for failure to deal effectively with the matter in the first instance, and Lord Ripon was so annoyed at this lack of consideration of the religion to which he had been converted that he resigned, though age and health were given as motives to avoid embarrassing the ministry. In 1910 Mr. Churchill managed to persuade him in advance that a procession in the vicinity of the Westminster Cathedral would not cause difficulty, and it passed off quietly. But it was left for George V.'s reign to see the legal removal of all Roman Catholic grievances (b) and the establishment under stress of war conditions of diplomatic representation at the Vatican (c).

A point of some difficulty presented itself to Edward VII. in virtue of the proposed marriage between the King of Spain and Princess Victoria Eugenie of Battenberg, daughter of his sister, Princess Beatrice. The marriage necessitated the conversion to Roman Catholicism of the Princess, and the Church Association and the Protestant Alliance, and the more weighty objections of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London had to be considered. Fortunately, however, for the King, it was found that as Princess Beatrice had married into a foreign family, though her husband was later naturalised, under the Royal Marriages Act, 1772, which

(a) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 659—63.

(b) Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1926; Ridges, Const. Law (ed. Keith), pp. 148, 379.

(c) For a discussion of the mode of addressing a sovereign pontiff, see Letters, 1 s., ii. 204, 210.

as a rule requires royal assent for the validity of the marriages of descendants of George II., no action by the sovereign, personally, was necessary, and the marriage duly took place (d).

Fortunately for the sovereign, the grant of wide legislative power to the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act, 1919, removes from him, personally, any concern with the tendencies towards Romanising in the Church which would have deeply affected his grandmother, who would have been most reluctant to authorise the Convocations to take action towards amending the Prayer Book in the direction of sanctioning practices which are, strictly speaking, illegal. If future efforts succeed better than those of 1927 and 1928 in securing the assent of the Commons (e), then the assent of the sovereign would be in the same position as his assent to an ordinary Act of Parliament.

It is still the case that the sovereign does not recognise the territorial appellations adopted by the members of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and addresses from the members thereof by their territorial styles may not be submitted by the Home Secretary to the King. This was reiterated in 1937, but it is of long standing, in view of the provisions of the Act of 1871, which repealed the prohibitions of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act (f).

7. Crown Appointments.

(1) A large number of offices at home and abroad have always been in the gift of the Crown, though the number has been affected by the removal of the sphere of patronage of a large number of posts in the civil service. The use of offices to reward party supporters was inevitable and natural, but

(d) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 512 ff.

(e) Taylor, Brentford, pp. 251—67. The issue was treated as open, and Mr. Joynson-Hicks had to contend against the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill in 1928, when approval was withheld by 266 to 220 votes. On the decline of Protestantism, see Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 75 ff.

(f) See correspondence with Archbishop Vaughan in 1892; Letters, 3 s., ii, 114.

Sir R. Peel struck a new note in determining to consider merit and long and faithful service as prime grounds for preferment (g). None the less it is clear that political reasons have power in affecting appointments. The part of the King in this part is clear. He is entitled to secure that those recommended for his approval are worthy; more he cannot well do, for he is seldom in a position to press the claims of others since he cannot normally have better knowledge than his ministers. Where, however, he can form a judgment, he is plainly entitled to maintain it, subject to the usual rule of yielding if the ministry make the matter one of principle.

Naturally, it is only the highest appointments which have to be specially submitted to the Crown, and in most of these cases both the Prime Minister and the minister in immediate charge of the department concerned take counsel together and recommend, for it is established practice that a departmental minister ought not to ignore in any such matter the Prime Minister. On occasion even the Cabinet may be consulted informally; the issue of filling the office of Viceroy of India has thus been dealt with. Normally, where the Prime Minister and the departmental minister are agreed, the sovereign will assent, as in the case of ambassadorial appointments or those of Governor-General, though in the case of the Dominions the appointment is now either formally (h) or in practice in the hands of the Dominion.

An instructive case, showing the Queen's good sense, is that of her attitude to the proposal to appoint Lord Elgin (i) Governor-General of India. She objected that "he is very shy, and most painfully silent, has no presence, no experience whatever in administration." The matter was considered (g) Parker, iii. ch. xv. See Finer, Modern Govt. ii. 1295 ff.

(h) Union of South Africa has no British action in those cases, and the last appointment was that of a local partisan politician, the Minister of Mines. As in Eire, a President may be substituted.

(i) Letters, 3 s., ii. 300 f., 304 f., 315 f. He was not a success as Viceroy, but the position there was very difficult, with plague, famine, and the North-Western frontier expedition (Letters, 3 s., iii. 216 f.).

virtually in Cabinet (k) and the proposal sustained largely because of the recommendations of his personal friends, Lord Rosebery, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and Mr. Marjoribanks; unquestionably the Queen's doubts were just, for Lord Elgin's strength lay in Scottish local government which ill-fitted him for the cares of India or of the Colonial Office, which was given to him in 1905 at the desire of the Prime Minister, a close personal friend, but whence he was immediately removed by Mr. Asquith (l). In the case of the proposed appointment of Sir G. Wolseley, later a favourite of the Queen, as adjutant-general in 1881, her objections were based on the Duke of Cambridge's hostility and reinforced by suspicions that Wolseley used the Press to further his military views. In the result, however, Mr. Gladstone secured acceptance of the appointment on terms (m).

The Queen's interest in diplomatic appointments was connected with her views on foreign policy. She undoubtedly took trouble to persuade her ministers in 1864 (n) and 1870 (o) to recall Sir A. Buchanan and Lord A. Loftus respectively from Berlin, as her daughter, the Crown Princess, warned her that they were not successful in carrying out their mission. Naturally, in 1880 (p), she stood up for Sir H. Layard, when it was decided to recall him from Constantinople, for he had been only an instrument of the policy of her late ministry. She had to accept the explanation that H. Layard was not considered satisfactory and that changes in such offices on change of government were not unusual. She showed appreciation of the vicissitudes of Sir R. Morier's career and pointed out that his unpopularity in Germany was (k) The selection of Sir H. Robinson in 1880 to replace Sir B. Frere at the Cape was made by the Cabinet as part of their policy of recalling Frere; Guedalla, ii. 109.

(l) Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 198.

(m) Gardiner, Harcourt, i. 415 f.

(n) Letters, 2 s., i. 206, 243.

(o) Letters, 2 s., ii. 80, 85. Cf. her action in 1884 in selecting Sir E. Malet for Berlin; iii. 532, 536, 538.

(p) Letters, 2 s., iii. 92 ff.

largely due to Bismarck's dislike of his relations with the Queen's daughter (q).

Edward VII. had naturally strong views on appointments, because he knew many people personally and thus was able to put them forward or criticise proposals to advance them with real knowledge, which in the Queen's latter days was certainly lacking. He regretted the haste to send Lord Kitchener to India, but later would gladly have made him Viceroy but for the refusal of Lord Morley to countenance the suggestion. He approved the appointment of Sir J. D. Poynder to New Zealand (r), but was not enthusiastic of the peerage demanded for that democratic community, especially as Lord Gladstone, whose appointment to South Africa he approved without enthusiasm, had been given a peerage for much more distinguished services than mere conversion rather late in life to Liberalism. In diplomatic appointments he had quite strong views, and he took much interest in the succession in 1908 (s) to Sir F. Lascelles at Berlin, which proved difficult to arrange, as Sir F. Cartwright proved impossible because of a youthful jeu d'esprit. Finally, as the result of a personal interview at Cronberg, Sir E. Goschen was appointed, despite his most natural reluctance to take a difficult post. He had been selected for his former post at Vienna on the royal initiative after the King had insisted on the fixing of a final date for the retirement from that embassy of Sir F. Plunkett on the score of age. He also pressed for promotion for Sir A. Herbert and Sir R. Rodd, with success in the former case (t).

The King's interest in defence appointments was natural. He encouraged Sir T. Kelly-Kenny to resist efforts to withdraw him from the office of Adjutant-General (u), and, though not enthusiastic about the new office of Commander-

(q) Letters, 3 s., i. 457 f. For Lord Beaconsfield's cleverness in making an appointment of General Wolseley, and then apologising, see Letters, 2 s., iii. 22, 24—26.

(r) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 708 f.
(t) Lee, ii. 180 f.

(s) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 618 f.
(u) Lee, ii. 86 f.

in-Chief in the Mediterranean, he induced the Duke of Connaught to accept it, and was much annoyed when in 1909 he refused to continue in a useless post (x). He persuaded Lord Kitchener to follow him, most reluctantly, but released him at a last interview on April 28th, 1910. He was in regular correspondence with Major-General Haig when he was Inspector-General of Cavalry in India, and gladly promoted his interests on the termination of that appointment. George V. continued the interest felt by his father, and wrote with his own hand to confer on him the rank of Field-Marshal, and in 1917 presented him with the Order of the Thistle, which the Duke of Buccleuch had declined to accept until it had been bestowed on the greatest living Scotsman. The King steadily supported Haig throughout with his confidence, and it is interesting to note that on April 8th, 1919, they were both in agreement on the unwisdom of the step then taken in depriving the troops of full dress; it has since been realised that as Haig then argued to maintain a voluntary army, it would be desirable "to clothe troops smartly, pay them well, and amuse them with games, &c."

Of the non-political appointments filled by the Crown the most interesting, of course, is the poet laureateship. The death of Lord Tennyson (y) should, no doubt, have been seized upon to afford the opportunity of terminating an office, which it has been only rarely possible, worthily, to fill. Instead Lord Salisbury quite inexcusably preferred (z) to it A. Austin, whose first effusion was the really incredible poem on the Jameson Raid, which was, in his words (a), "to the taste of the galleries in the lower class of theatres, and they sing it with vehemence." The further opportunity of dropping Mr. Austin on the death of the Queen was missed by Edward VII. (b), (x) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 496 f.

(y) A. Tennyson was recommended by Lord J. Russell in 1850; Letters, 1 s., ii. 272. He was offered a baronetcy by Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone (1873), and created a baron in 1883; Guedalla, ii. 245 f., 248.

(z) Letters, 3 s., ii. 582.

(a) Letters, 3 s., iii. 24. It has fair claims to be the worst poem of those of Poets Laureate. (b) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 53.

who thought wrongly that the post was unpaid—the stipend is £97—but who later called attention to the trash Mr. Austin wrote. Mr. Robert Bridges, in 1913, was preferred to Mr. Hardy or Mr. Kipling, and his refined and scholarly poetry did something to rehabilitate the office, but Mr. Masefield's poem on the death of George V. renews the doubt whether the office ought to be sustained.

In other cases Edward VII. showed interest, proposing Mr. Morley as successor to Lord Acton as Regius Professor of History at Cambridge, as against the more novel suggestion of Admiral Mahan by Mr. Balfour. Ultimately the office went to Professor Bury of Dublin, but it may be regretted that the King's prejudice in this case against foreigners deprived England of a singularly interesting appointment. Mr. Morley, no doubt, would not have desired the office. It is understood that George V., no less than his father, took a real interest in similar appointments. Inevitably political responsibility may have to be faced by the Premier in such cases, as when objections were taken to the appointment as Professor Gilbert Murray's successor at Oxford in 1936, of one who asserted his right of Irish citizenship.

The Prime Minister is solely responsible for the grant of civil list pensions, which to a total of £2,500 can be granted each year to persons who have rendered public service, or done important work in literature or in science, or, more often, to their dependants. The former niggardly total of £1,200 was only raised in 1937 under considerable public pressure, but it must be admitted that the first list, in 1938, did not contain many well known names, which may be variously explained (c).

(2) Judicial patronage, though exercised in the name of the Crown, is essentially a matter in which royal intervention must be limited, for appointments are necessarily made on grounds of technical qualifications, which the sovereign cannot well call into question. The puisne judges are chosen by the Lord Chancellor, who informs the Prime Minister as a matter of courtesy (d); Lord Brougham actually submitted first to the Queen and then informed the Premier (e). The other judges, the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, the Lords Justices of Appeal, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, and the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, are selected by the Prime Minister, who usually informs the Lord Chancellor of his proposals.

(c) Among recipients at various times have been Sir William Watson and "Ouida." The King may, of course, make suggestions.

The law officers of the Crown used to claim the right to be considered for appointment to the rank of Lord Chief Justice and Lord Chief Baron on vacancies occurring in these offices. This doctrine was solemnly repudiated by the Cabinet (f) after the passing of the Judicature Act, and promotion was to rest on length of service and qualification only, but there is no evidence that this doctrine was ever seriously acted upon. At any rate Mr. Gladstone, in his next ministry, treated Sir H. James as naturally entitled to the offer of a Lordship of Appeal and Master of the Rolls (g). But in 1907 Lord Davey's death was not followed by the natural appointment to fill the vacancy of Sir Lawson Walton, the Attorney-General, whose selection was expected on all hands. The Lord Chancellor intervened to secure that the Master of the Rolls should go to the Lords, being succeeded by Lord Justice Cozens-Hardy, the vacancy thus created being filled from the Court below. The explanation given to the disappointed claimant was that the judicial position was such as to demand the appointment of a new Lord of Appeal with judicial experience (h). It is clearly now the normal rule that the law officers should be seriously considered when vacancies occur in the headships of the divisions of the High Court or in (d) Cf. Mallet, Cave, pp. 296 ff.

(e) Life, iii. 86 ff.

(f) Letters, 2 s., ii. 290.

(g) Askwith, Lord James of Hereford, pp. 105 ff.

(h) Fitzroy, Memoirs, i. 315.

Lords of Appeal, but there is no absolute claim, and in 1938 the Lord Chancellor was chosen for judicial distinction, without any record of political service, and the Master of the Rolls in 1937 was without political claims. In Scotland the claim of the Lord Advocate on the other hand is regularly recognised, as in the case of Mr. W. G. Normand, who became Lord President in 1937.

Political considerations, no doubt, sometimes weigh with regard to appointments. In 1915 a serious difficulty arose, because the Conservatives, when forming a coalition with Mr. Asquith, insisted on securing the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland for Mr. Campbell, a proposal abhorrent to Mr. Redmond, whose remonstrances brought from Mr. Asquith the poignant admission: "Nothing but the most compelling sense of public duty could have induced me to be where I am, and surrounded as I am, and cut off as I am to-day" (i). The claim was compromised for the moment, but Mr. Campbell became Attorney-General in 1916, and Lord Chancellor in 1918, ending finally as Lord Glenavy and first Chairman of the Senate of the Irish Free State. More recent instances of political exigencies can be suggested, but royal action is really not involved. It would be difficult to conceive any concatenation of circumstances which would justify assertion of the royal discretion, for no Government would be reckless enough to put forward for judicial office any person not well qualified (k) and of respectable character; the days of men like Sir A. Cockburn, whose moral character was far below their ability, may safely be said to be gone.

In all cases of appointments the same rule applies; while the proposed appointee must necessarily be approached to learn if he will accept, it must be made clear that the offer is subject to the royal approval and that no mention of it must be made until such approval has been obtained (l). No doubt,

(i) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 168 f.

(k) Mr. Justice Darling's was a purely political appointment, but he was far from incompetent.

(l) In case of household appointments action, of course, without royal sanction is inexcusable; see J. D. Corigan's case in 1847: Letters, 1 s. " 197 cases happen where the fact leaks out before approval is given, but that is perhaps inevitable, for ministers and others are far from infallible.

8. The Honours Prerogative.

It is of the essence of honours of any kind that they should appear to be the personal gift of the sovereign, and for this reason all honours are submitted to and formally approved by the sovereign, and whenever possible the investiture with the insignia or other act in connection with its bestowal is performed by the King in person, or at least the royal signature is attached to the instrument conferring it. But the principle in the great majority of cases of the conferment of honours is that the recommendation to the sovereign goes from a minister, and normally the Prime Minister (m). There are certain exceptions in regard to honours for services in certain fields. Thus, the Order of St. Michael and St. George (1818) is conferred for foreign, Dominion and Colonial services on the recommendation of the Foreign, Dominions and Colonial Secretaries; those for army, navy and air force servants by these departments represented by their political chiefs; Indian services are rewarded by the Star of India (1861) or the Order of the Indian Empire (1877) on the proposal of the Secretary of State, and like provision, no doubt, will be made for Burma. But the Prime Minister is informed of the recommendations of ministers, though they go direct to the King, and for all other honours he is directly responsible, except in the case of the Royal Victorian Order (1896), which is personal to the King. The King also controls the Royal Victorian Chain (n), whose grant is very restricted and distinctly personal, and in the first instance the Order of Merit was to have been a personal order. Whether that has remained the case is not clear. At any rate, we may suppose that the King definitely approves

(m) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 1789 (Report of Royal Commission).

(n) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 99 f. It has been only rarely given, e.g., in 1935, to Earls Derby and Cromer, and in 1936 to the Duke of Kent. The honours of K.G., K.T., and K.P. are largely under royal control by suggestion.

those included in it, and does not accept merely formally the suggestions of the Prime Minister. If, on the other hand, the King desires to confer an award of honour or a baronetcy or peerage on any person for household or personal services (o), the Prime Minister must be asked to include the name on his list and thus to take full responsibility for it. The same remark, of course, applies if the King desires a reward to be conferred for public services (p) which is not spontaneously proposed by the Prime Minister.

The only issue, therefore, which is doubtful, is that of the control which the Crown exercises over the grant of honours, and in this case the facts certainly suggest a steady diminution in authority on the part of the Crown. The Queen in 1859 refused a Privy Councillorship to Mr. Bright (q) for his attacks on the institutions of the country, though later she was to regard him with favour. In 1866 (r) a new issue arose, the appointment of peers on the retirement of Lord Russell, the Prime Minister. The practice of giving honours on such occasions was already observed, and the Queen agreed to those desired by Lord Russell except peerages other than that for Lord Monck, for services in Canada. But she stressed the fact that several peerages had been created since Lord Palmerston's death, and that Sir R. Peel, Lord Aberdeen, and probably Lord Derby, had not made such proposals on retirement. But in 1868 (s), with some hesitation, she promised to create peerages for Lord Derby, who had embarrassed her and Mr. Disraeli by delaying his formal resignation because he wished to be in the position as Prime Minister to (o) E.g., Lord Sydney, Lord Chamberlain, in 1874; Guedalla, i. 447. So no doubt the Dukedoms of Fife and Windsor. For Lord Reay, see Guedalla, ii. 146. Lord Rosebery demurred to reckless bestowal of baronetcies on the occasion of a royal birth; Letters, 3 s., ii. 412 f. Cf. also Letters, 2 s., iii. 26.

(p) Lord Salisbury was delighted to knight musicians as named by the Queen, as he had no musical knowledge; Letters, s. 3, ii. 128 (1892).

(q) Letters, 1 s., i. 349.

(r) Letters, 2 s., i. 347. She used this precedent in 1868 to justify refusal to create peers to strengthen Mr. Disraeli on the eve of the general election; ibid. 552 f.

(s) Letters, 2 s., i. 498, 501—5.

announce his creations to those thus honoured. In 1869 (t) she declined a peerage to Sir L. de Rothschild as a Jew engaged in banking operations for foreign countries, his speculations she regarded as gambling. In 1881 she objected to the grant of a peerage to Sir G. Wolseley (u), but conceded it after his successes in Egypt next year. In one matter her attitude commands respect: she consented to give a peerage to Sir A. Cockburn in 1865 only because it had been promised, though without her authority, but asserted her duty of securing that peerages should be given only to people of good moral character (x). Her views were narrow in some respects; she would not, even at Lord Salisbury's urgent request, give Sir F. Leighton a peerage in 1891 (y), and that conceded in 1895 only preceded, shortly, his death. Sir W. Thomson was honoured in 1891, but mainly, it seems, because Lord Hartington urged his claim as an upholder of Unionism in Scotland. To Mr. Watts she denied, in 1897, a Privy Councillorship as inappropriate, though Professor Max Müller was accorded that distinction. But earlier he had refused a baronetcy (z).

In her own desires for honours her most notable struggle was that over a dukedom or the Garter for Lord Lansdowne on his retirement from the Governor-Generalship in India (a). Mr. Gladstone was willing to give a G.C.B. (Extraordinary), but rightly held that that nobleman's Indian services were not such as to justify the step proposed, and the Queen resented his argument that, after being Chancellor of the Exchequer, he himself had not resented the offer of an ordinary G.C.B., alleging that political party services could not be compared to great political services to the Queen and country. It is a melancholy thought that a minister of the Crown can (t) Guedalla, i. 207. For Mrs. Disraeli's peerage, see Letters, 2 s., i. 557.

(u) Guedalla, i. 141—51, 158—61 (a very strong refusal).

(x) Letters, 2 s., i. 257—62; he took a G.C.B. later; ii. 239.

(y) Letters, 3 s., ii. 105.

(z) Letters, 3 s., iii. 167; Guedalla, ii. 483, 488.

(a) Letters, 3 s., ii. 340 f., 343 ff. He got the Garter. For her unfairness to Mr. Gladstone, see Guedalla, ii. 471.

do less for this country than a Viceroy, who, after all at that time was a mere agent of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

Edward VII. was more enlightened, for he was anxious to honour C. A. Abbey and J. S. Sargent not less than H. von Herkomer and W. Q. Orchardson, but the two former were ruled out as not being British subjects (b). Lord Curzon he would have been glad to find a place for in the Lords on his return from India, but neither Mr. Balfour nor Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman would agree, the latter inevitably, as he had no responsibility for his Indian work (c). He was anxious to restrain his Government from excessive generosity in creations. He accepted ten peerages (d) for the first new year list, and gave with pleasure a Privy Councillorship to Henry Labouchere, the bête noir of his mother, but a man of character not dissimilar in some aspects to his own. For the June honours he tried to fight against seven peerages and eight Privy Councillorships, and above all against the peerage for Mr. Pirrie, but in vain, for Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, though full of respect for the King, was firmly convinced of his rights as Prime Minister. Three years later he conferred the St. Patrick on Lord Pirrie with great discontent, accentuated by the fact that none of the other knights would take part in an investiture, which therefore had to be performed privately by Lord Aberdeen (e), whom the King had no love for, mainly because of his failure to deal effectively with the theft of the jewels of the Order in 1907 just before the royal visit to Ireland, when he did not stay at Viceregal Lodge. The Aberdeens were also suspect on the score of their endeavour to create human relationships between themselves and their servants, both at Ottawa and in Dublin, acts pleasing per se, but regarded by the King as infra dignitatem of their office (f). He objected at first to give Ray Lankester

(b) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 469.

(d) Lee, ii. 451.

(f) Lee, ii. 472.

(c) Lee, ii. 379 f.

(e) Lee, ii. 452.

the K.C.B. on the score that he had not received the C.B. and had been removed from office at the Natural History Museum, but gave way at once when told that the offer had been as usual in such cases already made privately (g). He deprecated the grant of the Garter to the Shah of Persia on grounds which were perfectly sound, but was compelled on diplomatic grounds to concede it, but this was done in such a manner as to minimise any good from the grant (h). To the King of Siam he was steadfast in refusing the honour, but naturally gave it to the Emperor of Japan, and he gave in also to the wishes of ministers regarding the honours to be paid to Prince Fushimi on his visit in 1907 to return the compliment paid in the preceding year by the mission of Prince Arthur of Connaught to present the Garter to the Emperor, though he was reluctant to concede the full ceremonial honours usual in the case of a sovereign. He secured, however, through the Lord Chamberlain, the withdrawal from performance of The Mikado during the Prince's visit, and the military and naval bands were instructed not to perform the music of the opera during that period (i). One personal appointment of the King outside the Order of Merit and the Royal Victorian Chain, which he endeavoured to render important, was that of Lord Carrington to be a member of the Order of the Garter.

The real difficulty over honours, however, broke out during the reign of George V., as a result of the efforts made by the head of the coalition Government to secure a large political fund. The use of honours as political awards is naturally ancient; Walpole used it and W. Pitt found it excellent, when Burke's Act, 1782, curtailed the number of places and pensions available to bribe members for their support. The settlement of the civil list at the accession of Queen Victoria added to the difficulties of providing funds for payment of

(g) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 470. The King disliked special remainders for peerages, a view shared by George V.

(h) Newton, Lansdowne, pp. 239 f.

(i) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 313 f.

supporters, and the creation of party organisations by Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Chamberlain established the need of large subscriptions, which were naturally often forthcoming in return for promises of honours. The system was well recognised (k); applications were made (l) by individuals or friends to the Patronage Secretary—now Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury—in the case of M.P.'s, and to the head of the party organisation, who might be, and now is as a rule, different from the Parliamentary Secretary in other cases (m). Or the Prime Minister was approached direct (n). None of these high officials would admit that they had been cognisant of any bargain to give an honour for a contribution, but no one seriously supposes that the minor officials, at least, were not fully aware that there was in fact an understanding. That this was so was alleged in Parliament, and in 1914 elicited a resolution by the Lords against a contribution being a consideration for a recommendation for an honour; but the Commons did not accept the suggestion of similar action. It was alleged in the Lords—no doubt correctly—that the Chief Whip was so aware, or at least one of his subordinates, and the view was widely accepted even among Liberals at the time. No one expected that the Prime Minister was informed, and his denial was categorical (o). In 1917 in the Lords (p) it was unanimously demanded that the reasons for conferment of honours, other than royal or service honours, should be stated publicly, and that the Prime Minister should satisfy himself that no payment, or expectation of payment, to a party fund was directly or indirectly associated with the grant, or promise of the grant, of an honour. Thirty-four (k) E.g., E. Legge, King George, ii. 15—19. For earlier discussions (1907—8) see Halévy, Hist. 1905—15, pp. 306 ff.

(l) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 1789, p. 8.

(m) His list might be submitted to the Patronage Secretary for his observations.

(n) He then made up his mind, with or without further advice

(o) 15 H. L. Deb., 5 s., 252 ff.

(p) 26 H. L. Deb., 5 s., 172 ff., 835 ff.; cf. Mallet, Lloyd George, pp. 246—54; Jennings, Cabinet Govt., pp. 356 ff.

peers also voted for a preamble, asserting that honours had been conferred in return for payments, and Lord Selborne testified to spontaneous touting by persons who claimed to be able to influence the conferment of honours. He gave the name of Sir James Gildea, the founder of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association, as having thus been approached, and instanced the case of the Mayor of Lewes, in whose case the Whip had pronounced his claim good, but had demanded a contribution. Lord Knutsford instanced a case where a baronetcy was obtained for £25,000 contribution. Lord Loreburn expressly gave £25,000 as the price of a baronetcy, £15,000 for a knighthood, with a possibility of £10,000 for the latter (q), full value being allowed for the payment if a baronetcy was wanted later. Lord Curzon (r), on the other hand, frankly justified a wealthy man giving his money for the benefit of his country. The practice, however, of mentioning why honours were given in a purely perfunctory way was started in January, 1919, but in May the issue was again debated, this time in the Commons, when pointed reference was made to the honours given those connected with the papers loyal to the ministry (s). But a proposal to require publication of particulars of party funds did not pass. The proposed peerage for Sir J. B. Robinson in 1922 proved disastrous, for the nominee was under a cloud in South Africa, as the result of strictures on his conduct by the Chief Justice, and the Colonial Secretary had not been consulted, while the ex-Governor-General very bluntly denounced the honour as quite undeserved (t). The peerage was ultimately declined, but the discussions in both Houses drove the Government to the appointment of a royal commission. The further evidence adduced in the debates had shattered the pretence of no sale. The Commission recommended the setting up by each (q) The price before the war was lower; £5,000 is recorded for 1910; 26 H. L. Deb., 847; Legge, ii. 18.

(r) 26 H. L. Deb., 200.

(s) 116 H. C. Deb., 5 s., 1334 ff.

(t) 50 H. L. Deb., 5 s., 1126 ff.; 51 ibid. 103 ff., 475 ff.; 156 H. C. Deb., 5 s., 1745 ff.

Government of a committee of the Privy Council of not more than three members, not in the Government, for the period of existence of the Government. It receives notice of proposed political honours, and is supposed to satisfy itself that no element of payment is involved, whereupon it reports to the Prime Minister if the person is a suitable person to be honoured. If its report is unfavourable, the Prime Minister must submit it with his recommendation to the King. This committee was duly accepted, and has since been periodically set up (u). Moreover, in 1923, the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act was passed, penalising persons who promise to secure honours for payment and those promising to pay. With the reduction of the size of honours lists the issue is less discussed, but there is really no reason to doubt that honours are still used to reward party contributions, though no doubt the whole matter is managed with the quiet decency which marked the business before the creation of Mr. Lloyd George's political fund. One case of grave error was exposed by proceedings in bankruptcy in Scotland, when it transpired that a baronetcy had been conferred for a payment, which was returned on the suicide of the baronet, who had involved himself in heavy losses through his concern with liquor smuggling into the United States. Carelessness in awards was painfully frequent, and the local public opinion was often shocked at honours bestowed on persons whose claims to any distinction were quite invisible.

How far the new rules are efficacious in preventing irregularities is not certain. The case of Parkinson v. College of Ambulance (x) throws a painful light on the methods employed to obtain honours, and the prosecution successfully of a trafficker in honours, and civil proceedings in which he was subsequently concerned (y), prove absolutely the truth of Lord Carson's assertion from personal experience in practice, that brokerage was regularly paid on such transactions. It is not surprising that in Canada since 1919, except under Mr. Bennett's disastrous Premiership, the giving of honours has been stopped as a source of corruption, or that the Union of South Africa adopts the same principle.

(u) In 1938 Lord Macmillan, Mr. G. N. Barnes, and Lord Crewe.

(x) [1925] 2 K. B. 1.

(y) Maundy-Gregory, In re, Trustee v. Norton, [1935] Ch. 65.

The honours lists appear on January 1st, and on the date, real or adopted, of the King's birth anniversary. Large lists are issued at jubilee and coronation celebrations (2), and for these the leader of the opposition party—or leaders, if more than one—are usually asked to make some suggestions. The vast majority of those honoured, however, are supporters of the ministry.

Apart from normal honours are those, as mentioned above, bestowed on the retirement of a Prime Minister. The King, on such occasions, himself offers an honour to the retiring Premier. Mr. Gladstone refused consistently, Lord Salisbury deprecated the offer of a dukedom, Mr. Lloyd George remained a commoner, as did Mr. MacDonald, while Mr. Baldwin accepted the usual earldom and the Garter, and secured a viscountcy for a personal friend. In such cases responsibility rests, no doubt technically, with the incoming Prime Minister. It is clear that in the case of Mr. Asquith's earldom and Garter in 1925, while the offer was made at a time when there was for the moment virtually an interregnum, the responsibility rested ultimately with Mr. Baldwin (a).

In minor matters of honorary character the sovereign has, no doubt, a comparatively free hand, as in the case of precedence. When ministers desire, it is, of course, regulated as they recommend, as in the case of the place assigned to the Prime Minister, which was decided upon by Mr. Balfour (b),

(2) Lee, Edward VII., n. 95 ff. 1,540 honours were given in 1902, 515 in 1911. In 1937 the Queen received the Thistle; Queen Alexandra was given in 1901 the Garter (Lee, ii. 54 n. 2), which was also given to Queen Mary and Elizabeth; the latter is Grand Master of the Royal Victorian Order.

(a) Spender, Lord Oxford, ii. 351 ff. Lord Derby in 1859 stressed the personal aspect of his Garter: Letters, 1 s., iii. 342.

(b) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 443 f. The Speaker's precedence after the Lord President was given by Order in Council.

who was inclined to emphasise the outstanding position of the head of the Government. Similarly in the Dominions precedence is virtually regulated by the Governors-General, unless ministers intervene.

Medals are properly issued only with the sanction of the Crown, and this practice is jealously followed. Queen Victoria disliked even the grant without her approval of a medal to the forces of the East India Company, and in agreement with ministers (c) firmly vetoed the idea of giving colonial forces in the South African war a special star, on the sound ground that all medals issue from the sovereign personally, a rule still respected in the Dominions. But, whereas she had authorised the grant of a local medal in Ceylon, not even that precedent would move Edward VII. to allow one in Hong Kong, despite the special pleading of Mr. Lyttelton, whose amiable character did not give him sufficient force to have his own way with a masterful King (d). He had definite ideas on the grant of permission to wear foreign medals, and to accept foreign decorations. Though, at first, inclined to allow acceptance freely, as in the case of the officials decorated by the German Emperor on his visit to England to grace the funeral of Queen Victoria by his presence, he later realised that the results of the practice were unsatisfactory, and the wearing of such decorations has been restricted with royal sanction (e).

Types of uniform were of great interest to Edward VII., who took under his special protection the regiments of Guards, and in 1904 critically reviewed the defects of their overcoats. His historic sense showed itself in his success in securing the restoration to the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry of the right to wear a red pagri with the foreign service white helmet to perpetuate the gallantry in the field of its predecessor, the (c) Letters, 3 s., iii. 574 f. Lord Milner wished to make the clasp a special gift from the Queen; on the other hand she insisted on having an Ashanti Star in 1896, because Prince Henry of Battenberg died on service; Letters, 3 s., i. 32.

(d) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 182.

(e) Lee, ii. 101 f.

46th Regiment, in 1777 (f). The subject of dress and equipment, as well as of armaments, also interested George V. and his successors.

The King also is consulted personally on all issues of salutes (g) and official visits, as in the case of the recognition to be paid to Indian princes and other rulers of protected territories within the Empire. Coinage designs are regularly submitted for his approval, which is not a formality.

Even on the issue of the name of the Royal Family the principle of ministerial responsibility was duly observed. The King readily recognised as the war continued that public feeling was running against the connection of the Royal Family with Germany, and accordingly, on July 17th, 1917, a Council (h) was held to approve a proclamation taking the name of Windsor for the Royal Family and the discontinuance of all German titles. It is significant that the Council included to represent the Empire the High Commissioners for the Commonwealth of Australia and the Union of South Africa as well as General Smuts. Ministers also approved the further step of conferring on those members of the family who abandoned foreign titles the ranks of Marquis of Cambridge (i), Earl of Athlone, Marquis of Milford Haven, and Marquis of Carisbrooke.

A minor but not important vexation arises as regards the grant of honorary distinctions to foreign sovereigns, to which allusion has already been made. Queen Victoria declined to lavish the Garter, confining its bestowal to special occasions,

(f) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 209.

(g) Edward VII. vainly asked for a special salute for the Duke of Connaught as Inspector-General: "no go. The Secretary of State for War is as obstinate as a mule" (Lee, ii. 199). The effort to name a battleship in 1912 Oliver Cromwell was negatived by George V.: Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 500.

(h; E. Legge, King George, i. 293 ff. For the many other grants of precedence, change of designation, &c., see 286 ff., 297 ff. Parliamentary intervention was necessary to deprive the Dukes of Albany and Cumberland and Brunswick of their titles: 7 & 8 Geo. V. c. 47; Order in Council, March 28th, 1919.

(i) Formerly Duke of Teck, Prince Alexander of Teck, Prince Louis of Battenberg, and Prince Alexander of Battenberg.

as after the Crimean War to the Sultan, to the King of Denmark as the father-in-law of the Prince of Wales, and to visiting sovereigns, especially if relatives, as in the case of the Kings of Portugal and the Belgians. She refused, therefore, to send it to the Emperor of Russia in 1866, though advised to do so by Lord Stanley (k). To William II. she gave the Hon. Coloneley of the Royals, which greatly delighted him in 1894, and allowed him to have the privilege of conferring honours on two of its officers. This action seems to have been taken without the advice of ministers (l), and this failure to consult was repeated in 1908 by Edward VII., when, in his desire to please the Czar during his visit to Reval, he created him an Honorary Admiral of the British Fleet (m). Mr. Asquith immediately pointed out that neither he, nor Sir E. Grey, nor Mr. McKenna, nor the Cabinet, had been consulted. There was no excuse for the King's totally unconstitutional action, and he admitted to all three ministers that he regretted he had, without knowing it, acted irregularly. As was pointed out, had the matter been raised in the Commons, the ministry would have been placed in a most unfortunate position; as already mentioned, the King had already been brought into a sense of his duty to accept ministers' advice by the threat of resignation over the grant of the Garter to the Shah of Persia. He made also a very serious blunder in May, 1905, when he advised the Grand Master of the Order of St. Michael and St. George to appoint as Chancellor the Duke of Argyll. As the appointment was one to be filled by the Colonial Secretary under the statutes of 1877, Mr. Lyttelton properly protested, and only acquiesced reluctantly in the acceptance of the illegal action of the King (n). Nothing, of course, is more incumbent on the sovereign than obedience to the law, and as advice is always available, action of this kind can have no just excuse. Normally, of course, marks of distinction for relatives will be advised without hesitation by ministers, unless some political signification could arise. The matter is now of very minor interest (o).

(k) Letters, 2 s., 1. 370. (l) Spender, Campbell-Bannerman, 1. 128.

(m) Lee, Edward VII., ii. 593 f., Spender, Lord Oxford, i. 249—51. Lord Knollys pointed out that the King should have had a minister to keep him straight; Esher, Journals, ii. 322.

(n) Lee, ii. 523.

As in the case of appointments, the person whom it is proposed to honour ought to be approached in confidence to ascertain whether the proposal is acceptable (p). Thus, in the case of the services, honours are only conferred after due enquiry. In some cases of distinction in letters, science or art, or otherwise, the honour may be conferred without such enquiry. At least, that alone can excuse the occasional instances in which the issue of an honours list is followed by an announcement that the recipient does not desire it, in which case, of course, the formal steps to confer the honour are not taken. The refusal of a lower honour sometimes is a bar to further advancement; sometimes it has no such effect. Thus Earl Haig had earlier declined a peerage of inferior standing, and it appears that Mr. Barrie declined a knighthood, though, finally, he accepted the rarer honour of a baronetcy, which his means easily enabled him to support. It may be added that the abolition of payment of fees on obtaining honours has simplified their acceptance.

(o) For the converse case of foreign honours cf. Queen Victoria's objections and those of ministers to the Prince of Wales accepting a Russian regiment in 1873: Letters, 2 s., ii. 297 f.

(p) In the case of Mr. Balfour's K.G. the King pressed the proposed recipient direct, and gave him it at a Cabinet. Fitzroy, Memoirs, ii. 775—77. A peerage soon followed.

CHAPTER X.

THE CONSTITUTION UNDER STRAIN.

1. The International Crisis of September, 1938.

IN September, 1938, there developed a situation showing the grave dangers to which the threat of war must necessarily expose the democratic elements of the constitution.

The ease with which Germany annexed Austria, and the rapid withdrawal of the British and French protests, paved the way for public acceptance of the accord with Italy of April 16th arranged by the Prime Minister, though its terms involved the recognition, in defiance of the League Covenant, of the Italian conquest of Ethiopia; the admission of Italy to equal rights in regard to Saudi Arabia and the Yemen; the surrender of further extension of British authority over the Arab chiefs under British protection, and of any claim to a protectorate over the islands on the coast not included in these States; and recognition of the presence of Italian forces in Spain, despite the non-intervention agreement. The deep anxiety of the British Government to secure peace at any price was thus made manifest, and this fact, in part, explains the development of the German attack on Czechoslovakia.

After the seizure of Austria assurances had been given on March 13th to Czechoslovakia that Germany had no territorial designs against her. But it appears that Lord Halifax (a) and his colleagues recognised from the first that the German claim for the inclusion in the Reich of all Germans must result in Germany insisting on recovering those lands, which had for historical and other reasons been included, though containing large numbers of Germans, in the Czechoslovakia State in 1918. Unfortunately no steps were taken to make it clear to Czechoslovakia that Britain would not regard Article 10 of the League Covenant as imposing any obligation on her to assist that State in maintaining her territorial integrity. Still less did France indicate any doubt as to her performing faithfully her obligations under the Locarno Treaty of 1925. When, indeed, in May clashes between Sudeten Germans and Czechs were reported, France and Russia re-affirmed their treaty obligations on May 21st, and on May 23rd Mr. Chamberlain announced in the House of Commons that "the British Government have represented to the German Government the importance of reaching a settlement if European peace is to be preserved."

(a) Speech at Edinburgh, October 24th, 1938.

In July, Lord Runciman was appointed special adviser to the Czechoslovak Government on minority questions (b), and by his advice that Government made very generous offers of autonomy to the Sudeten German minority, and on August 27th Sir John Simon redefined the attitude of Britain, as regards Central Europe, in the terms used by Mr. Chamberlain on March 24th, when he refused to promise aid to Czechoslovakia in case of aggression, or automatically to aid France, if involved with Germany as a result of fulfilling her treaty obligations, but insisted that, if war broke out, it would be impossible to say where it would end, or what Governments might be involved, stressing the intimate relations of Britain with France.

The Czechoslovak concessions had by this time reached a stage offering every possibility of an honourable solution, but this would not have suited the plans either of Herr Hitler or of Herr Henlein, the Sudeten leader, and at Nuremberg, on September 12th, Herr Hitler demanded the right of self-determination for the Sudeten Germans. On September 15th Mr. Chamberlain decided to visit Herr Hitler at Berchtesgaden, apparently under the impression that by personal intercourse

(b) Parl. Pap. Cmd. 5847, pp. 3 ff.

he would succeed in reaching a successful settlement (c). On September 16th he returned, and obtained Cabinet approval of a policy involving the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia. On September 18th M. Daladier, the French Premier, and M. Bonnet, the Foreign Minister, visited London and adopted a policy in accordance with the demands of Herr Hitler. It was enforced on Czechoslovakia, by warnings, that the French promise of 1925 could not be made good, and that Britain would not support France, if she were engaged in war for the sake of Czechoslovakia (d). On September 21st Czechoslovakia accepted, "under extreme duress," this dictation, which involved the surrender of all territory which had a bare majority of Germans by nationality therein resident. On September 23rd Mr. Chamberlain re-visited Herr Hitler at Godesberg, only to find that his terms had become increasingly severe, now that he realised that Britain and France had abandoned Czechoslovakia. Mr. Chamberlain was unable to accept for Britain the terms offered, and fresh consultations in London with the French ministers followed on September 25th and 26th. On September 28th Parliament was reconvened, and at the close of his narrative Mr. Chamberlain announced that Herr Hitler had consented to receive him and M. Daladier, in conjunction with Signor Mussolini, at Munich. On September 29th and 30th terms were adjusted, which Czechoslovakia was compelled to accept, and the Prime Minister received an ovation on return, when he announced this result.

The Czechoslovak Government had been offered on September 19th a guarantee, for the territories left to the State, by Britain and France. The worthlessness of this guarantee was patent; if, while the State still retained its fortress barrier, it could not be effectively defended by Britain and France, the possibility of according aid once the State had been dismembered was obviously precluded. In fact no effort was made to protect the State against the demands for territorial concession immediately made by Poland and Hungary, and the British and French representatives on the Commission, set up to determine the surrenders to be made by the State to Germany, acted as desired by the German delegate, whose decisions were accepted without question. The result was that the principle of self-determination, which had been adduced as the ground justifying British surrender, was completely ignored. The lands in which by the census of 1910 there was a bare German minority were handed over to Germany, without any attempt being made to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants, though many Germans had no desire to be subjected to a despotic régime in lieu of democratic institutions. Mr. Chamberlain, on November 1st, admitted that 580,000 Czechs were included in the surrendered areas.

(c) 339 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 5—26.

(d) Czechoslovak Government Statement, September 21st, 1938.

The Polish and Hungarian demands were pressed on the same basis, and Italy favoured a project advanced by Poland, under which Poland and Hungary would obtain a common frontier. German opinion rejected this solution as imposing a barrier to her claims on the Ukraine, and an arbitral decision by Germany and Italy on November 2nd, while refusing a common frontier, presented Hungary with some 5,000 square miles of territory and 1,064,000 inhabitants. The Ruthenian capital, and the important industrial Slovak town of Kosice, with other areas almost severing the communications between Slovakia and Ruthenia, were given to Hungary under Italian, Polish and Hungarian pressure. The utter dependence of Czechoslovakia on Germany and Italy was expressed by the profuse promises of loyalty at once given to these powers by M. Chvalovsky as Foreign Minister, who announced his country's adhesion to the Berlin-Rome axis (e). The Communist party was suppressed, and free circulation given to Herr Hitler's political programme, Mein Kampf, no doubt as a preliminary to later German action to create in the Ukraine a vassal State. The remoulding of the Czechoslovak constitution to limit democracy is contemplated, in view of the desertion of the democratic powers, and the good faith exhibited by Germany and Italy to their protégés.

(e) Assurances reported in Giornale d'Italia, November 2nd, 1938. Poland obtained by accord Teschen.

As was pointed out by Mr. Eden and Mr. Churchill in the Commons, the settlement effected, which was justified by Mr. Chamberlain in the name of self-determination, denied any opportunity of voting as to their fate to the people in the areas affected, though Signor Mussolini had just before pronounced a plebiscite essential, and represented a triumph for the principle of force pure and simple. They stressed also the fact that the result of the transaction was to give Germany undisputed domination over Eastern Europe up to the Russian boundary and to ensure the decline of British trade; their criticism in this regard was at once proved true by the haste of Turkey to conclude an important accord, and by pressing overtures from the other Balkan States.

Throughout the crisis Russia was deliberately ignored, despite M. Litvinoff's offer to implement the Czechoslovak-Russia treaty and his suggestion that the League Council should take the issue into consideration. Earl Winterton, indeed, endeavoured to excuse the French failure to keep faith by reluctance of Russia to act, but that statement was at once shown to be false.

It must be noted that the doctrine of self-determination insisted on by Mr. Chamberlain condemns as wholly unjustified the destruction of the liberty of the Arabs of Palestine in favour of German and Polish Jews. The House of Lords, on June 21st, 1922 (f), by a majority of sixty to twenty-nine, condemned the mandate as a direct violation of the pledges given to the people of Palestine in the declarations of October, 1915, and November, 1918; Lords Buckmaster, Carson, Parmoor and Sumner voted in the majority, despite the special pleading of Earl Balfour, whose plea, as Lord Buckmaster pointed out, evaded the point at issue. It is difficult to see how, after Munich, the policy of forcing on the Arabs Jewish domination can be reconciled with national honour (g) or national interest.

(f) 50 H. L. Deb. 5 s., 994—1034.

It must further be added that the German claim for the return of the mandated territories becomes irresistible in logic. In the case of the Czechoslovak State the census of 1910 was accepted by Britain as the just basis of deciding the fate of the territory, and on a like basis all the German colonies must be deemed to belong rightly to Germany. For Germany to accept their retention by Britain would imply a lack of national self-respect, which is incredible.

The surrender over Czechoslovakia led forthwith to surrender to Italy. France hastily accredited an envoy to the King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia, and the British Government, on November 1st, announced its decision to follow suit, and to bring into operation the Italian agreement of April 16th. It was vainly pointed out by Mr. Eden and Lord Crewe (h) that the ministry had pledged itself to the view that the agreement could become effective only when a Spanish settlement was arrived at, and that it was absurd to regard the withdrawal of 10,000 infantry, after eighteen months' service, while larger numbers remained behind, including technicians and airmen, as a settlement. Exception was also taken to the dishonour involved on the King by requiring him to withdraw recognition from the Emperor of Ethiopia, when he was bound by Article 10 of the League Covenant to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of his realm. It is singular that Lord Maugham (i), in his defence of the action of the ministry, absolutely ignored the provisions of the Covenant, and treated the matter as if it were a mere case of recognition.

(g) To execute as rebels men taking up arms in defence of liberty is open to grave moral objection. See Keith, The Scotsman, October 14th, 17th and 21st, 1938.

(h) 110 H. L. Deb. 5 s., 1640—44 (a conclusive argument).

(i) Ibid. 1678.

of a conquest at international law. This deliberate repudiation of the Covenant as part of international law is on a par with the assertion of the Prime Minister (k) that "we had no treaty obligations and no legal obligations to Czechoslovakia," and must be noted with profound regret.

2. The Effect of the Crisis on the Constitution.

Important internationally as are these events as marking the complete change in the European balance of power and increasing the danger of war in Europe, they are no less significant of defects in the British constitution. The theory of the constitution demands that foreign policy should be conducted in accordance with the ascertained wishes of the electorate through the Foreign Office, the Foreign Secretary, and the Cabinet under control by the House of Commons, and subject to the concurrence of the Crown. All these safeguards were lacking in the results achieved by the initiative of the Prime Minister.

(1) The Prime Minister acted without the presence of the Foreign Secretary, who was thus deprived of the opportunity of aiding by his counsel his chief, when confronted by a much younger and more vigorous personality, enjoying the support of a large mobilised army. Moreover, he chose as his companions, not the Permanent Under Secretary of State or the Chief Diplomatic Adviser to the Government, but officials of much less diplomatic experience, a fact which led to the inevitable conclusion that he did not desire to receive any advice which might be unpalatable.

(2) As a result of his initiative, he presented the Cabinet with virtually no option but to accept his views and to homologate them. He had interviewed the Fuehrer, and could insist that war was inevitable, unless the action he advocated was taken. If the Cabinet had refused to yield, he could have resigned, giving as his reason that the course rejected was the sole alternative to war, or have advised a dissolution, when the country would have been asked to vote for peace or war. In either case the country would have been paralysed by a Cabinet crisis at a critical moment, while it was only too notorious that Herr Hitler struck at Austria at the moment when France was undergoing one of her normal Cabinet difficulties and a ministry with power to act was wanting. The situation can be illustrated by the action of Mr. Baldwin when he returned from the United States in January, 1923, after arranging a separate debt repayment agreement wholly against the intention of the Premier. By announcing the terms forthwith to the public without consulting his colleagues, Mr. Baldwin created a position for which Mr. Bonar Law, recognising the folly of the action taken, would gladly have evaded responsibility by resignation, a course from which he was with much difficulty restrained (l). The position of the Prime Minister was, of course, much stronger, especially since the right to dissolve seems to lie in his hands alone (m)

Cabinet responsibility involves in principle the determination of policy of a novel kind by the Cabinet without undue pressure. When the Prime Minister determines it, and presents his colleagues with the choice of acceptance or his resignation, the deliberative power of the Cabinet disappears in favour of one-man rule, and democracy is pro tanto weakened.

(3) The action taken again eliminated any real possibility of royal intervention. From the Prime Minister's statements (n), it does not even appear that he was in touch with the King regarding his intention to negotiate personally, though presumably he informed him of his intention to leave the realm. The modus operandi clearly deprived the King of any opportunity of discussion, as opposed to mere (l) Beaverbrook, Politicians and the Press, pp. 59—62.

(m) Cf. 339 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 548.

(n) September 28th, October 3rd and 6th. The King is not referred to homologation of a policy in whose formation he had taken no part. It is significant that the accord (o), which Mr. Chamberlain asked the Fuehrer to sign on September 30th, was one between himself and the German dictator, the Royal name being entirely ignored.

(4) In his attitude to Parliament the Prime Minister persisted in refusal to be hampered by advice or criticisms in his action. Despite urgent suggestions by the opposition leaders, reinforced by many other bodies, the Commons was summoned only to meet on September 28th, when its assembling was essential in view of the gravity of the situation, which had led—too tardily, as Mr. Duff Cooper stressed in his speech explaining his resignation (p)—to the orders for the mobilisation of the fleet. At that meeting the Prime Minister's speech ended with the intimation of the acceptance of his wish for a further conference, and the Commons was so carried away by mass hysteria as to render it impossible for Mr. Attlee and Sir A. Sinclair to state the case for the limitation of concessions to reasonable limits, though their failure to do so must be disapproved. But the essential fact was that British policy had been determined with complete lack of reference to the Commons, and that body had been precluded from any useful function. It is impossible to regard such action as compatible with the democratic principles of the constitution. That the Commons approved ex post facto is not sufficient excuse; confronted by a fait accompli, it had no alternative but to agree.

The episode certainly established the desirability of adopting a rule that, when Parliament is not in session, the Speaker must summon the Commons on the request, not merely of the head of the Government, but also on that of the leader of the opposition or of a specified number—say, 100—of members. To reduce the Commons to a mere instrument to register decisions of the Government, as now in Germany, is dangerous to the welfare of the realm (q).

(o) The Times, October 1st, 1938.

(p) 339 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 36.

(5) The attitude of the Prime Minister to the people is significant. His return from Munich on September 30th was followed by the dramatic announcement: "This is the second time in our history that there has come back from Germany to Downing Street peace with honour. I believe it is peace for our time." Further, his accord with Herr Hitler was then announced. It is not surprising that his achievement should have captured for the moment the public imagination. Only reflection showed the vital difference between the success of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury at Berlin in 1878 and the results of Munich. The former, in the language of Mr. Buckle (r), was "a victory for free institutions in a continent which had been drifting for some years towards autocracy." The latter signalled the deliberate breach by France and Britain, under threat of war, of solemn obligations to Czechoslovakia, the dismemberment of that State, the destruction of its independence and democracy, and the amazing reinforcement of the uncertain authority of Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini. The former settlement proved later to have been a blunder, Britain having in Lord Salisbury's picturesque admission, put her money on the wrong horse, the latter was proved at once worthless to Czechoslovakia, neither France nor Britain attempting to fulfil their guarantee in the face of Polish and Hungarian demands. The accord with Herr Hitler, which was acclaimed as a new "peace pact" by the Press, was not reduced to its proper dimensions until October 6th, when in the Commons Mr. Chamberlain showed that it was no more than expression of opinion that war inter se should, in the view of the British and German peoples,

(q) The refusal of the Government to allow Parliament to sit after October 6th until November was, no doubt, convenient as avoiding questions regarding the operation of the Munich agreement, which proved the inaccuracy of Mr. Chamberlain's claims for it. A widely-signed protest against ignoring Parliament was issued in London, October 2nd, 1938, never be resorted to (s). The same thing had been said with far wider authority in the Paris Pact, which Herr Hitler had just violated, as against both Austria and Czechoslovakia. At the same time it was admitted that the assurance of "peace for our time" was made under emotional strain, and that the country must proceed to vastly increased armaments. To reconcile such a policy, with the belief in the sincerity and good faith of Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini, is not easy, and in Germany resentment of British re-armament, as inconsistent with appeasement, has been expressed.

(r) Diasraeli, ii. 1240.

The policy adopted, both as regards Germany and Italy, was plainly wholly inconsistent with the will of the electorate, as expressed in 1935, in support of the policy then avowed by the ministry of loyal support of the League of Nations. That had been preceded by the Peace Ballot (t) carried through under the auspices of the League of Nations Union, which exhibited the considered desire of the public for maintenance of international law and collective security. The right of a ministry elected on such a platform to jettison it, without reference to the electorate, can only be conceded by those who reject democracy as a fit form of government.

But the difficulty of democratic government was singularly revealed by the denunciation, during the discussion of the Munich agreement, by Mr. Churchill of the suggestion that the Prime Minister might capitalise his success, and appeal to the country to give a verdict for the hero of the peace. Mr. Chamberlain declined to admit that such action would be "constitutionally indecent," but, following the precedent of Lord Beaconsfield in 1878, refrained from an appeal. He explained that he did not wish to make party capital out of the prevalent feeling of thankfulness, nor to magnify differences of opinion, as a general election must do. A dissolution would be demanded only if a new issue arose, which required a new mandate from the country, or if he felt he had lost the confidence of his supporters (u). The wisdom of the decision from a party standpoint may be commended. There would have been delivered against Mr. Chamberlain a severe attack, based on accusations (x) of sympathy with Fascism and the betrayal of democracy, while stress would have been laid on the grave failure of the National Government, in the seven years of its existence, to make proper provision for national security. The measures hastily taken in September had proved that both the Home Office and the War Office preparations for defence were insufficient, and that the country had been deplorably weak at the moment of possible conflict (y). On the other hand, Mr. Churchill evidently felt that the people could not be trusted to give a wise verdict, when under the stress of emotion, through relief from danger of a war, in which defective defences would have entailed grave sufferings, while arrangements for compulsory billeting would have created grave overcrowding and much unhappiness in country areas. If this judgment is sound, it must be admitted that the British democracy is still very far from politically mature, as a result, no doubt, of the excessively wide franchise.

(s) 339 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 549. The demerits of the pact are brought out by Mr. Duff Cooper, ibid. 38.

(t) Results presented by Lord Cecil to Mr. Baldwin, July 23rd, 1935.

A curious phenomenon of the issue was the fact that The Times, early in the proceedings, tentatively hinted at a solution by dismemberment, which it commended as a mode of giving effect to Article 19 of the Covenant providing for peaceful change, while up to the eve of the surrender the views of the Government were officially stated to negate the solution of the newspaper. It is natural to conclude that its policy represented that of a section of the Cabinet, which ultimately prevailed through the initiative of the Prime Minister. This is supported by the fact that Mr. Chamberlain never committed himself, despite pressure, to the negation of (u) 339 H. C. Deb. 5 s., 548.

(x) Made by D. N. Pritt, K.C., on October 30th at Edinburgh.

(y) Wholesale admissions were made by Sir S. Hoare and Mr. Hore-Belisha on November 3rd, 1938.

German colonial ambitions, thus leaving open the way to appeasement on this head. In the main, the Press accepted the result as preferable to war, though with uneasy recognition that surrender to force leads to further encroachments. While the Prime Minister's activity was generally commended, in some quarters it was pointed out that nothing was gained by it which could not have been achieved by diplomatic procedure, and that the British surrender, when made by the Prime Minister in person, affected the national prestige more gravely than if effected less spectacularly. Some stress also was laid on the contrast between Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's defiance of Germany and his son's acceptance of her hegemony, and regret was not concealed that the wise guidance of George V. or Queen Victoria, or the flair for politics of Edward VII., was lacking at the critical moment.

Mr. Eden drew from the double surrender the conclusion that a national policy should be evolved, supported by a true National Government, which would mobilise the country effectively for defence and resistance to further humiliation. But no response was given, either by the Government or the Labour party to the appeal, and the resignation of Mr. Duff Cooper, and the premature death of the Dominions Secretary, led merely to re-shuffling of posts; the Admiralty being entrusted to a peer, despite the objections to so vital an office being held out of the Commons. The vacant post of Lord Privy Seal was used to provide for a minister to co-ordinate measures for civil protection in war, and to turn to use the many offers of voluntary service elicited by the crisis, while the Dominions and Colonial Offices were for the time being placed under one control, a decision natural, in view of the fact that the issue of the German colonies deeply concerns both the British and the Dominion Governments which hold mandates. It is significant that, while the Italian agreement has no reference to the Dominions, the decision to make it operative was approved by the Commonwealth and the Union Governments, as opposed to the silence of New Zealand, which adheres to loyalty to the League, Canada, and Eire. The two assenting Dominions were doubtless motived by the desire to obtain Italian support in moderating the inevitable German claim for the return of her colonies, and the annulment of the national dishonour involved in the British assertion of German incapacity to govern natives justly. Unhappily the Union's own native policy is not to be distinguished in principle from that of Germany before the war, and in 1921 General Hertzog committed himself to the doctrine that the future fate of South-West Africa must be determined by the German inhabitants. There are obvious difficulties in negativing the return to Germany either of Tanganyika or South-West Africa as demanded by the Union (z). Though, however, appeasement is commended by the inability of the National Government to keep pace in re-armament with Germany, it is rendered difficult by resentment felt at the German treatment of the Jews, and on November 14th and 16th it was stated that the transfer of the territories was not under consideration, though no promise for the future was given, as contrasted with the assurances of M. Daladier that France would not alter the territorial status achieved by the war.

Britain, moreover, has renewed her assurances to Portugal of the binding force of the declaration of 1899, and of the British guarantees of the Portuguese colonies.

(z) Keith, The Scotsman, October 27th, November 4th, 1938. On the Italian agreement, ibid. November 1st, 1938.

I N D E X .
—♦—

- ABBEY, C. A., proposed honour for, 543.
- ABERCORN, DUKE OF, consulted by Queen, 437.
- ABERDEEN, FOURTH EARL OF,
consulted by Queen Victoria, 433, 470.
does not recommend retirement honours, 541.
Prime Minister in 1852—1855...36, 37, 57, 108, 129, 251, 296, 297, 474.
views of, on principles affecting dissolution, 393, 394.
- ABERDEEN, MARQUIS OF, Edward VII's dissatisfaction with, 511, 543.
- ABERHART, W., Premier of Alberta, 8.
- ABOLITION OF ARMY PURCHASE, 206, 513.
- ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS BILL, 1892, Queen Victoria's views on, 465, n.
- ACCESSION DECLARATION ACT, 1910...530.
- ACCESSION, proclamation of King, 203.
- ACCORD between Mr. Chamberlain and Herr Hitler, September 30th, 1938, not a pact but an expression of opinion, 561, 562.
- ACT OF SETTLEMENT, 1701...14, 25, 358.
- ADDERLEY, SIR CHARLES, Lord Norton, proposal to dismiss, 104, 110.
- ADDINGTON, HENRY, Lord Sidmouth, 19.
- ADDISON, CHRISTOPHER, resigns in 1921...127.
- ADJUTANT-GENERAL, 225.
- ADMIRALTY BOARD, 227. (See also LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF THE ADMIRALTY.)
- AEHRENTHAL, BARON VON, deceives British Government, 490, 491.
- AERONAUTICAL RESEARCH COMMITTEE, 227.
- AFGHANISTAN, 489, 499, 500.
- AGRICULTURAL ADVISORY COUNCIL, 237.

- AGRICULTURAL MARKETING FACILITIES COMMITTEE, 237.
AGRICULTURAL MARKETING REORGANISATION COMMISSION, 237.
AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH COUNCIL, 191.
AGRICULTURAL WAGES BOARD, 237.
AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES, Ministry of, 49, 189, 236, 237.
AIR, Secretary of State for, 49, 52, 141, 189, 194.
AIR COUNCIL, 227.
AIR DEFENCE, bad condition of, in 1938...564.
AIR FORCE, 141.
AIR MEMBER—for Development and Production, 226.
 for Personnel, 226.
 for Supply and Organisation, 226.
AIR-RAID PRECAUTIONS, 214.
AKERS-DOUGLAS, A., 266, 325.
ALBANY, DUKE OF, deprived of title, 550, n.
ALBERT, PRINCE CONSORT, 37, 39, 42, 101, 357, 422, 424, 432, 436, 461, 468, 471, 474, 475.
ALBERT, VICTOR, PRINCE, 119.
ALEXANDER II, Czar of Russia, 477.
ALEXANDER OF BULGARIA, PRINCE, Queen Victoria's approval of, 417.
ALEXANDER OF SERBIA, KING, assassinated in 1903...485.
ALEXANDRA, QUEEN, Garter conferred on, 548.
ALFONSO, KING OF SPAIN, marriage of, 488, 531, 532.
ALGECIRAS, possibility of blockading, 479.
ALGECIRAS CONFERENCE, 1906...487.
ALLIANCE, restrictions on power of Government to arrange secretly, 285.
ALSACE AND LORRAINE, French claim on, 485.
ALTERATION IN NAMES OF REGIMENTS, requires Royal sanction, 427.

ALTHORP, LORD, elevation to Lords is occasion of fall of Melbourne Ministry, 369.
becomes Lord Chamberlain, and Viscount (1906)...62.

ALTERNATIVE VOTE, 336, 341.

AMBASSADORS,

British—

 appointment of, 218.
 audiences of, with Crown, 482.
 may correspond direct with Crown, 447.
 foreign, access to Crown of, 449, 485.

AMERICAN DEBT, settlement of, 1923...83, 126, 560.

AMERY, L. C. M. S., 433, n.]

AMRITSAR MASSACRE, 507.

ANGLO-FRENCH ENTENTE, 1904...484, 485.

ANGLO-FRENCH NEGOTIATIONS, 1905—1912...92.

ANGLO-ITALIAN AGREEMENT, April 16th, 1938...153, 269, 284, 385, 494, 509, n., 553, 558.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN NEGOTIATIONS, 1914...93.

ANGLO-SCOTTISH RAILWAY ASSESSMENT AUTHORITY, 172.

ANNE, QUEEN, 15, 16, 25, 359.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY, mode of, 319, 320.

ANNUAL SESSIONS OF PARLIAMENT, conventional basis of, 2.

ANSON, GEORGE, Private Secretary to Prince Consort, 442, 443.

ANSON, SIR WILLIAM, 309, 310, 377.

ANTI-CORN LAW LEAGUE, 316.

ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY, 316.

ANTWERP, Mr. Churchill's mission to (1914)...137, 425.

APPOINTMENTS, ROYAL, principles as to, ecclesiastical, 524—529.

 executive, 532—537. judicial, 537—540.
 not normally discussed in Cabinet, 118.
 submitted to Crown, 427, 430, 431.

APPROPRIATION ACT, 193, 197, 198.

 as check on illegal action of Ministry, 408.

APPROVED SCHOOLS, under Home Secretary, 215.

ARABI PASHA, position of, 437.

- ARABS IN PALESTINE, unfair treatment of, 177, 358.
- ARBITRESS OF EUROPE, Queen Victoria as, 459.
- ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY,
ex officio included in Cabinet, 27.
influence of, on ecclesiastical appointments, 527, 528.
member of Board of Trade, 234.
Oath on homage, 430.
- ARCHBISHOPS, appointment of, 525.
- ARCOS, LTD., raid on, 214.
- ARGYLL, DUKE OF,
his action in 1714...26.
Secretary of State for India (1868—1874)...129, 437, 464, n.
- ARMY AND AIR FORCE (ANNUAL) ACT, 8, 408.
- ARMY COMMISSION, warrant authorising purchase of, revoked, 206, 513.
- ARMY COUNCIL, 164, 165, 166, 206, 225.
- ARMY OFFICERS, no authority to decide Government policy, 379—383.
- ARMY POLICY, 225.
Crown's connection with, 512—522.
- ARNOLD-FORSTER, H. O., Secretary of State for War, 428, 517—519, 550, n.
- "ARROW," case of the lorcha, Palmerston's defeat on, 474.
- ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT, PRINCE,
Garter Mission of, to Japan, 544.
- ASHANTI STAR, 549, n.
- ASHBURTON, LORD, concludes unfavourable treaty with United States, 468, 469.
- ASQUITH, H. H., EARL OF OXFORD AND ASQUITH, appeals to people, 254, 255.
appointments by, 504, 539.
as Prime Minister, 79, 97.
as Secretary of State for War, 106.
ecclesiastical appointments by, 528.
on Marconi contract issue, 187, 188.
opposes coalitions, 326, n.
not consulted on grant of rank as Admiral to Czar, 551.
position of—
 in 1915...57, 157.
 in 1916...11, 30, 32, 94, 158, 159, 433, 434.
Prime Minister—
 in 1908—1915...34, 36.
 in 1915—1916...36.
records of Cabinet proceedings by, 131.

ASQUITH, H. H., EARL OF OXFORD AND ASQUITH—continued.

- removes Lord Elgin from office, 534.
- relations of, to press, 276.
- resignation of, 325.
- retirement honours of, 548.
- secures succession to Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, 42, 43.
- serves on Committee of Imperial Defence, 139.
- shouted down in Commons, 322.
- supplies information to Crown, 421, 422, 423.
- treatment of colleagues by, 79.
 - question of Catholic procession, 531.
- views of—
 - on dissolution where three parties exist, 395.
 - on Finance Bill, 439.
 - on franchise issue, 121.
 - on Government of Ireland Bill, 377, 378, 410, 439.
 - on Mandate, 310.
 - on Parliament Bill, 403, 404, 405, 439.
 - on party leadership, 274, 275.
 - on referendum, 342, 343.
 - on responsibility of Ministers for acts of Crown, 364, 365, 369.
 - on services of his predecessor, 32.
 - on Somaliland, 504.
 - on War issues, 184, 186, 181.

ASSENT, ROYAL,

- in case of Church Measures, 532.
- normally automatic, 8, 9.
- to Bill to alter powers of House of Lords, 375—377.
 - to extend duration of Parliament, 384.
 - to provide unjust franchise, 384.

ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL, 232.ATHOLL, DUCHESS OF, political wisdom of, 269.*ATTLEE, C. R., leader of Labour opposition, 332, 441, n., 561.*ATTORNEY-GENERAL,

- England, 117, 118, 212, 244, 245.
- Duchy of Lancaster, 246.
- Durham, 246.

AUSTRALIA. (See also COMMONWEALTH.)

- alternative vote in, 341.

AUSTRIA, 218, 284, 289, 312, 470, 471, 472, 475, 476, 477, 490, 491, 553.AUSTIN, A., Poet Laureate, 536.*AYRTON, A., removed from office, 104, 106.*BACCHANTE, cruise of princes in, 119.*BACON, LORD, denies limitation of Parliamentary sovereignty, 331.

- BAGEHOT, W., his views on constitution, 251, 256, 271.
- BAHAMAS, 222.
- BAHREIN, British jurisdiction in, 219.
- BALDWIN, S., now Earl,
attitude of, in 19221...07.
becomes Prime Minister, 7, 34.
changes Ministry, 105.
controls statements of resigning ministers, 154.
dissolves Parliament, 10, 288, 289, 398.
election manifesto of, 320.
fails to provide for defence, 289, 290.
foreign affairs under, 137.
honours of, on retirement, 548.
position of, in 1931...43, 58, 435.
Prime Minister—
 in 1924—1929...9, 82.
 in 1935—1937...34, 36, 44, 58, 73.
resignation of—
 in 1924...297.
 in 1929...10, 300, 301.
responsible for surrender to Italy on sanctions, 283.
secures and forces on colleagues unwise settlement of American debt, 83, 126, 560.
views of—
 on colleague's speeches, 123.
 on Committee of Imperial Defence, 141, 142.
 on defence, 229, 304.
 on difficulty of democracies to be in time, 289, 522.
 on issues, 314.
 on mandate from electors, 311, 312.
 on protection, 112, 113, 311.
- BALFOUR, ARTHUR JAMES, EARL OF, advised as to successor, 41, 42.
as First Lord of Admiralty, 98, 99, 100, 158,
as Prime Minister, 1902—1905...32, 36, 42, 71, 78, 79.
as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 99.
attitude of—
 in 1909...438.
 in 1910—1911...372, 373, 405, 406.
 in 1912—1914...375, 376.
 in 1916...57, 295, 433, 434.
 in 1923...433, n.
creates Committee of Imperial Defence, 139, 141, 144, 323.
decision of, to resign in 1905...139, 108, 111, 256, 258, 259, 289.
destroys chance of Lord Curzon for Premiership, 33. fails to keep Edward VII. informed, 420, 466, n. honours conferred on, 552, n.
memorandum on trade by, 131.
misunderstanding in Cabinet of, 132.
National Home for Jews promoted by, 176, 177. relations of, to Mr. Lloyd George, 94.
resigns party leadership, 273, 326.
secures resignation of ministers, 104, 105.
supports Chinese labour in the Transvaal, 333.

BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, LORD, 131.

BALLOT ACT, 1872...305, 307.

BANK OF ENGLAND,

 Consolidated Fund Account at, 196.
 relieved from obligations to pay gold—
 in 1914...96.
 in 1931...285.
 Treasury control over, 232.

BANKRUPTCY DEPARTMENT, Board of Trade, 235.

BARBADOS, 222.

BARING, SIR E., Lord Cromer, 496.

BARNARD, SIR J., on ministerial responsibility, 359, n.

BARNES, E. W., Bishop of Birmingham, 528.

BARONETAGE, Privy Council Committee on, 205.
 roll of, 212.

BARONETCY, Prime Minister recommends for, 541.

BARRIE, J., accepts baronetcy, 552.

BASUTOLAND, 220, 503.

BEACONSFIELD, EARL OF. (See DISRAELI.)

BEATRICE, PRINCESS, daughter of Queen Victoria, 531.

BECHUANALAND PROTECTORATE, 220, 503.

BELFAST, royal speech at, 1921...442, 512.

BELGIAN NEUTRALITY, violation of (1914), 93, 493.

BELGIUM,

 defence discussions with, before Great War, 91. invasion of, 493.

BENGAL, partition of, reversed (1912), 427, 507.

BENNETT, R. B., Premier of Canada, resumes grant of honours, 548.

BENSON, DR. E. W., Archbishop of Canterbury, 526, n.

BENTINCK, LORD GEORGE, leader of Conservative party, 272, 306.

BERCHTESGADEN, Mr. Chamberlain's surrender at, 554, 555.

BERESFORD, LORD CHARLES, disputes of, with Sir J. Fisher, 520.

- BERMUDA, 222.
- BETHMANN-HOLLWEG, HERR VON, 491.
- BETHNAL GREEN MUSEUM, 242.
- BIGGE, SIR ARTHUR, Lord Stamfordham, 442.
- BISHOPS, appointment of, 525.
- BILLS,
Governmental consideration of, before introduction into Parliament, 111, 135.
drafting of, 231.
private member's, 124, 125, 267.
supervised by Law Officers, 244.
royal assent to, 8, 9, 375—377, 384.
- BIOGRAPHIES, as sources of information, 10, 11.
- BIRKENHEAD, EARL OF, F. E. Smith, 57, 113, 117, 185, 186.
- BIRMINGHAM, elections in, 257.
- BIRRELL, AUGUSTINE, Irish Secretary, 248, n.
- BISMARCK, PRINCE, 477, 478, 480, 481, 535.
- BJÖRKÖ, agreement of William II. and Nicholas II. at, 487.
- “BLACK FRIDAY,” 252, n.
- “BLACK HAND OF THE PEERAGE,” 418.
- BLACKPOOL CONFERENCE OF LABOUR PARTY, 262.
- BOARD OF CONTROL, 240.
- BOARD OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE, 172, 192, 194, 231.
- BOARD OF EDUCATION, 189, 205, 241—243.
- BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE, 172, 192, 194, 231.
- BOARD OF TRADE, 189, 190, 205, 234, 236, 237, 238, 246.
- BOARD OF WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS, 243, 244.
- BOGNOR REGIS, title given to, 429.
- BOLINGBROKE, LORD, exile of, 358.
- BOLSHEVISTS, favoured by Mr. R. MacDonald, 252.
- BONAR LAW, ANDREW,
action of—
in 1915...57.
in 1916...57, 158. 433. 434.

- BONAR LAW, ANDREW—continued.
 aids Lloyd George, 79, 80, 161.
 appeals to people, 254.
 as Prime Minister, 1922—1923... 32, 81, 107.
 dissolves in 1922... 295.
 does not advise King as to successor, 43, 365.
 electoral mandate of, 320.
 lack of courtesy to the King, 435, 443.
 leader of Conservative party, 273.
 Parliament Bill attacked by, 376.
 presides over Committee of Imperial Defence, 141.
 Press, used by, 276.
 regards as unsatisfactory American debt settlement, 83, 126, 560.
 views of, on constitutional rôle of King, 495.
 on Sir F. Maurice's charges, 166.
- BONNET, GEORGES, French Foreign Minister, breaks faith with Czechoslovakia, 555.
- BORDEN, SIR ROBERT, Premier of Canada, on War Cabinet, 160.
- BOSCAWEN, SIR A. G., Minister of Agriculture, 50.
- BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA, annexation of (1908), 491.
- BOTHA, GENERAL LOUIS, Premier of Transvaal, 503.
- BOURNE, CARDINAL, 531.
- BRADFORD, SIR E., Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, 430.
- BRADLAUGH, C., Impeachment of the House of Brunswick, 460.
- BREACH OF LAW BY CROWN, objections to, 551, 552.
- BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS, 305.
- BRIBERY OF POLITICIANS, 17, 544.
- BRIDGEMAN, O., advises George V., 433, n.
- BRIDGES, ROBERT, Poet Laureate, 537.
- BRIGHT, JOHN, in Gladstone's Ministry, 55, 125, 131, 541.
- BRISTOL, EARL OF, case of, 400.
- BRISTOL CHANNEL, jurisdiction over, 214.
- BRITISH BROADCASTING CORPORATION, 168, 169, 233, 234, 250.
- BRITISH EMPIRE DELEGATION AT PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE, 160.
- BRITISH INFERIORITY IN DIPLOMACY, causes of, 480, 481.
- BRITISH MUSEUM, 172, 231.

- BRITISH NATIONALITY, not applicable to nationals of Eire, 441.
- BRITISH NATIONALITY AND STATUS OF ALIENS ACTS, 1914, 1918...213.
- BRITISH NEW GUINEA, annexed, 496.
- BRITISH NORTH BORNEO, protected State, 222.
- BROADCASTING, control of, 233, 234.
- BROADWOOD, COL., 516.
- BRODRICK, T. JOHN, EARL OF MIDDLETON, controversy with Lord Curzon by, 420.
difficult position of, 517.
- BROUGHAM, LORD, 21, 401, 538.
- BROWN, JOHN, and Queen Victoria, 444.
- BRUCE, H. A., Home Secretary, transferred to Presidency of Council, 104
- BRUNSWICK, DUKE OF, deprived of title, 550, n.
- BRYCE, JAMES, Viscount, 57, 256, 465, n.
- BRYCE REPORT ON HOUSE OF LORDS, 329, 330, 344.
- BUCHANAN, SIR A., recall of, 534.
- BUCKINGHAM PALACE CONFERENCE, 1914...374, 375.
1916...11, 433.
- BUCKLE, G. E., verdict of, on Berlin Congress, 1878...562.
- BUCKMASTER, LORD, condemns mandate for Palestine, 557.
- BUDGET, defeat on, necessitates resignation, 298.
leakage of information as to, in 1936...14, 115.
preparation of, 194—198.
- BUDGET STATEMENT, 114, 115.
- BULLER, GENERAL SIR REDVERS, removed from office, 517.
- BULGARIA, 417, 422, 477, 478, 485, 491.
- BULWER, E. LYTTTON, electoral tract by, 305.
- BUREAU OF HYGIENE AND TROPICAL DISEASES, 221.
- BURKE, E., 21, 234, 257.
- BURKE'S ACT, 1782, enforces economy, 544.

BURMA, Secretary of State for, 49, 141, 176, 211, 508, 540.

BUTE, MARQUIS OF, Prime Minister in 1763...18.

BUTLER, R. A., Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 246.

BUTT, SIR ALFRED, M.P., resignation of, 115.

BY-ELECTIONS,

as test of popularity of Ministry, 288, 289, 379.
result in postponement of re-armament, 522.

BYNG, VISCOUNT, Governor-General of Canada, gives dissolution to Mr. Meighen, 379, 396.

CABINET,

under Anne, 15, 16.
under George I., 16, 17.
under George II., 17, 18.
under George III., 18—20.

CABINET COMMITTEE ON DEFENCE POLICY AND REQUIREMENTS, 146, 147.

CABINET RESPONSIBILITY AND THE ABDICATION OF EDWARD VIII., 366—368.

CABINET SECRETARIAT, 133, 134, 135, 137, 190.

CABINET, SYSTEM, THE,

appointments sometimes submitted to, 533, 534.
as affected by party system, 256—284.
attitude of, to Edward VIII.'s abdication, 366, 367.
coalitions, 128—130, 325, 326.
committees of, 147—151.
control by House of Commons of, 251—256.
control of Parliament by, 279—287.
controls in theory, foreign policy, 281—285, 480, 481, 553, 559, 560.
differentiated from Council, 24—29.
dissolution of Parliament by, 396—399.
dominated by Prime Minister in crisis, 554, 555, 559, 560.
electorate, relations to, 251—256, 327.
dissolution, 287—304.
mandate, 304—313.
execution of decisions of, 134.
formal transfer of office to new, 62—65.
formation of, by Prime Minister, 48—62, 109.
formulation of issues for, 313—320.
functions of, 109—120.
growth of, 356—366.
Home Affairs Committee, 111.
Imperial Defence Committee, 88, 92, 97, 139—147, 156, 194. inner, 137—139, 140, 141.
matters not normally considered by, 115—120.
minutes of, 134.

CABINET SYSTEM, THE—continued.

- limitation of powers of, projects for, 332—335.
- devolution, 349—355.
- Parliamentary committees, 346—349.
- proportional representation, 335—341.
- referendum, 341—346.
- number of members of, 109, 110.
- Prime Minister, selection of, 30—48.
- procedure in, 130—139.
- relation of, to House of Lords, 327—331.
 - leaders of opposition, 321—326.
- relation of Prime Minister to colleagues in, 75—86.
- responsibility of, 27, 28, 120—128, 356—391.
- secrecy of proceedings in, 119, 151—156.
- unanimity of, 28, 29, 106, 107.
- voting in, 83, 126, 127.

CACHET SEAL, 211.

CADMAN, LORD, Committee on enquiry into Civil Aviation (Cmd. 5685), 226, 227, 317.

CAIRNS, LORD, 436.

CALEDONIAN POWER BILL, 1937 and 1938...125, 217, 352.

CAMBRIDGE, DUKE OF, Commander-in-Chief, 61, 225, 446, 513, 514, 534.

CAMDEN, LORD, on responsibility of Ministers, 27.

CAMEROONS, mandated territory, 222.

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, SIR HENRY.

- appeals to people, 85.
- as Prime Minister, 79.
- commits his Cabinet, 112.
- dissolves Parliament in 1905...394.
- insists on honours, 543.
- party leader, 272, 273.
- position of—
 - in 1904...41.
 - in 1905...47, 57.
- Prime Minister in 1905—1908...32, 34, 71.
- refuses to put pressure on President Kruger, 324.
- relations of, to Imperial Defence Committee, 139.
- secures retirement of Duke of Cambridge, 225, 446, 514.
- uncommunicative to Edward VII., 421.

CAMPBELL'S CASE, 1924...117.

CANADA. (See also DOMINIONS.)

- capital chosen for, 496.
- does not approve Italian agreement, 1938...566.
- forms of treaties of, 453.
- no honours now granted in, 548.
- right of neutrality of, 509.
- title of Kingdom denied to, 496.

CANNING, GEORGE,

- on ministerial responsibility, 360, 361.
- on royal interviews with ambassadors, 449.
- recognises South American Republics, 412.

- CANNING, LORD, Governor-General of India, 513.
- CANONS, Crown appointment of, 525.
- CANTERBURY. (See ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.)
- CARDWELL, E., LORD, 397, 443, 513.
- CARLINGFORD, LORD, resignation of, 102, 104.
- CARNARVON, EARL OF, in Disraeli's Ministry, 100, 387.
- CAROLINE, QUEEN,
favours Walpole, 17
wife of George IV., 22.
- CARRINGTON, EARL OF, K.G., 544.
- CARSON, SIR EDWARD (later Lord), 100, 158, 273, 374, 375, 380, 387, 439, 557.
- CARTERET, later Lord Granville, 18.
- CARTWRIGHT, SIR F., 535.
- CASES CITED.
Bowles v. Bank of England (1913), 408.
Cristina, The (1938), 220.
Dalrymple v. Colonial Treasurer (1910), 5.
Duff Development Co. v. Government of Kelantan (1924), 219.
Fagernes, The (1927), 214.
Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless, Ltd. (1938), 220.
Home Secretary v. O'Brien (1923), 5, 244.
Lewis v. Cattle (1938), 49.
Marais Case (1902), 208.
Maundy-Gregory, In re, Trustee v. Norton (1935), 547.
Parkinson v. College of Ambulance (1925), 547.
Ratshekedi Khama v. Ratshosa (1931), 219.
Sussex Peerage Case (1844), 368.
Woolmington v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1935), 245.
- CASEMENT, SIR ROGER, 429.
- CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION, in Ireland, 22.
- CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION, 20, 24, 28, 29, 502, 523, 529.
- CATTLE COMMITTEE, 237.
- CAUCUS SYSTEM, 257, 258.
- CAVE, SIR GEORGE, Home Secretary, 248, n., 301, n., 377.
- CAWDOR, EARL OF,
First Lord of Admiralty, 155.
advice of, to Edward VII., 438.
- CECIL, LORD HUGH,
on dissolution of Parliament, 377.
organises disorder in Commons, 322.

- CENTRAL COUNCIL OF COAL OWNERS, 235.
- CENTRAL ELECTRICITY BOARD, 169, 237, 238, 250.
- CENTRAL HOUSING ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 240.
- CENTRAL MIDWIVES BOARD, 240.
- CENTRAL OFFICE OF CONSERVATIVE PARTY, 261, 262.
- CENTRAL OFFICE OF LABOUR PARTY, 264.
- CENTRAL OFFICE OF LIBERAL PARTY, 259.
- CENTRAL REGISTRY OFFICE FOR FRIENDLY SOCIETIES, 231.
- CEREMONIAL ATTENDING CROWN, desirability of simplification of, 445.
- CESSION OF TERRITORY AND RIGHTS OF PROTECTORATE, 281, 282.
- CHAMBER OF PRINCES, India, 507.
- CHAMBERLAIN, JOSEPH, 57, 60, 61, 75, 105, 122, 123, 131, 137, 152, 187, 254, 257, 279, 308, 318, 460, 464, 483, 545.
- CHAMBERLAIN, N., budget of 1937 of, altered, 116.
disapproves sanctions against Italy, 283, 312.
elected Party leader, 274.
enforces policy on Cabinet and Parliament, 559—566.
foreign policy of, 82, 96, 123, 136, 152, 153, 269, 329, 332.
personal, appeal of, 255, 256.
Prime Minister from 1937...34, 44, 51, n., 58, 74. surrenders to demands—of Eire, 410.
 of Germany, 553—559. of Italy, 494, 495, 553. views of, on air parity with Germany, 304.
violates League Covenant in respect—of Czechoslovakia, 284, 553—559.
 of Italy, 269, 284, 385, 494, 509, n., 553, 558.
- CHAMBERLAIN, SIR AUSTEN, 57, 81, 95, 106, 161, 272, 273, 302, 323, 325, 326, 343, 345, 372, 373, 407, n., 410, n., 435.
- CHANAK EPISODE, 1922...32, 107.
- CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER, 49, 52, 53, 55, 65, 243.
- CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, 49, 87, 135, 143, 150, 208, 229, 230.
special position of, as regards Cabinet discussion of estimates, 192.
- CHANNEL ISLANDS, 212.
 Privy Council Committee on, 205.
- CHAPLIN, A., omitted from Cabinet in 1900...104.

- CHARITY COMMISSIONERS, 171, 242, 248, 249.
- CHARLES I., 24, 358.
- CHARLES II., 20, 24.
- CHARLES OF DENMARK, PRINCE, becomes King of Norway, 487.
- CHARTERS AUTHORISED BY ORDERS IN COUNCIL, 204, 452.
- CHELMSFORD, LORD, unsatisfactory campaign of (1879), 514, n.
- CHEQUERS ESTATE ACT, 1917...87.
- CHIEF DIPLOMATIC ADVISER TO THE GOVERNMENT, 217. ignored in 1938...559.
- CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF, 226.
- CHIEF OF THE IMPERIAL GENERAL STAFF, 164, 165, 225.
- CHIEF OF THE NAVAL STAFF, 228.
- CHIEF WHIP. (See Whips.)
- CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE, 141, 143, 144, 145.
- CHILLERS, H. C. E., M.P., 61.
- CHILDREN, Home Secretary's duties as to, 214, 215.
- CHINA,
British jurisdiction in, 219.
defeat of Lord Palmerston on policy in, 67.
Russian encroachment on, 281.
war with Japan (1894), 481.
- CHINESE LABOUR IN SOUTH AFRICA, 176, 333, 342, 502.
- CHINESE LABOUR ORDINANCE, 1904.
Transvaal, 426.
- CHOICE OF RESIGNATION OR DISSOLUTION, 293, 294.
- CHITRAL, retention of, 501.
- CHRISTIAN IX., King of Denmark, 487.
- CHURCH ASSOCIATION, 531.
- CHURCH OF ENGLAND,
communicates with Crown through Home Secretary, 212. relations with Crown of, 520—529.
- CHURCH OF ENGLAND ASSEMBLY (POWERS) ACT, 1919...9, 532.
- CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, 529, 530.

- CHURCHILL, LORD RANDOLPH, 87, 90, 107, 108, 116, 127, 152, 195, 313, 417.
- CHURCHILL, W. S., 55, 59, 62, 79, 99, 100, 105, 107, 126, 127, 129, 137, 141, 145, 153, 166, 186, 195, 228, 246, 304, 319, n., 326, n., 355, 367, 396, 418, 503, 521, 532, n., 557.
- CHVALOVSKY, M., Foreign Minister of Czechoslovakia, 556.
- CINEMATOGRAPH FILMS BILL, AND ACT, 1938...355.
- CIVIL CONTINGENCIES FUND, 200.
- CIVIL LIST PENSIONS, 537.
- CIVIL SERVICE, 184, 185, 193, 200. higher posts in, approved by Crown, 533.
relations with political heads, 179—184.
tenure of, at pleasure, 185.
- CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION, 172, 184, 231.
- CLARENCE, DUKE OF, Lord High Admiral, 227.
- CLARENDON, FOURTH EARL OF, 56, 58, 60, 91, 129, 413, 473.
- CLARENDON, SIXTH EARL OF, proposals of, for Lords reform, 330.
- CLERK OF THE CROWN IN CHANCERY, 207, 208.
- CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS, 208.
- CLERK OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL, 133, 147, 204, n.
- CLYNES, J. R., Home Secretary (1929—31), 138, 445.
- COAL MINES BILL, 1938...355.
- COAL MINES NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL BOARD, 235.
- COAL MINES REORGANISATION COMMISSION, 235.
- COALITION GOVERNMENT, 36, 57, 99, 128.
1915...129, 157, 158.
1916...129, 130, 158, 159.
1931...130.
- COBBETT, W., 22.
- COBURG INFLUENCE, attacked, 475.
- COCKBURN, SIR ALEXANDER, Chief Justice of England, 539, 542.
- CODEX SINAITICUS, purchase of, 200.
- COINAGE, 451.
- COINAGE ACTS, 1870 AND 1920...204, 452.

COINAGE OFFENCES ACT, 1861...245.

COLLECTIVE RESPONSIBILITY OF CABINET, 27, 28, 120—128, 356—391.

COLLEGE OF ARMS, 171

COLLINGS, JESSE, 38, 30 J.

COLONIAL BISHOPS, 528.

COLONIAL CONSTITUTIONS, given by letters patent, 204.

COLONIES, Secretary of State for the, 49, 141, 168, 176, 178, 179, 190, 213 219, 220—223, 565.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF,

India—

form of appointment of, 451.
pressed for control of Press, 505, 506.
office, of, 224, 225, 419, 446, 513, 514, 517, 518.

COMMANDERS' COUNCIL OF ARMY, 225.

COMMISSIONERS OF CROWN LANDS, 192, 231.

COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE, 172, 192, 194, 231.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, 172, 192, 194, 231.

COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS AND FORESTS, 243.

COMMITTEE OF CIVIL RESEARCH, 150.

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL FOR EDUCATION, 205.

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL FOR SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH, 206.

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL FOR TRADE AND PLANTATIONS, 205, 234.

COMMITTEE OF IMPERIAL DEFENCE, 88—92, 97, 139—147, 156, 194.

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL EXPENDITURE under Sir E. Geddes, 141.

COMMITTEES,

connected with—

Board of Education, 242.
Board of Trade, 235.
Colonial and Dominion Offices, 221.
Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, 237.
Ministry of Health, 240.
Ministry of Labour, 239.
Ministry of Pensions, 241.
Ministry of Transport, 237, 238.
Treasury, 231, 232.

- COMMITTEES OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL, 205.
- COMMONS. (See House of Commons.)
- COMMONWEALTH COURT OF CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION, 343.
- COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA,
duration of Parliament in, 331.
general election treated as referendum in 1929...343.
mode of concluding treaties in, 453. referendum in, 345, 346.
style of, 496.
- COMMUNICATIONS WITH FOREIGN STATES, Foreign Office control of, 218.
- COMMUNISTS, 74, 263, 264, 321.
suppressed in Czechoslovakia, 556.
- COMPANIES, control of, 235.
- COMPTON, LORD A., 524.
- COMPTRROLLER AND AUDITOR-GENERAL, 170, 171, 193, 196, 250.
as check on illegal activities of Ministry, 372, 408.
- CONFERENCE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, 1928...354.
- CONFIDENCE, vote of, when ministry disapproved in Lords, 327.
- CONFIDENTIAL CABINET, 26.
- CONGO, misgovernment of Belgian, 486.
- CONGRATULATIONS FROM CROWN TO GENERALS IN THE FIELD, 447.
- CONNAUGHT, DUKE OF, son of Queen Victoria, 507, 514, 518, 536.
- CONSCRIPTION, failure of Commonwealth referenda on, 346.
- CONSERVATIVES, 36, 37, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 78, 100, 122, 129, 130, 242, 256, 257, 260, 261, 268, 270, 275, 276, 284, 286, 304, 308, 310, 312, 314, 322, 324, 328, 333, 334, 335, 336, 341, 366.
- CONSOLIDATED FUND, sums charged on, 193.
- CONSOLIDATED FUND ACTS, 197.
- CONSPIRACY TO MURDER BILL, 1858...68.
- CONSTANTINE, King of the Hellenes, 493.
- CONSTITUENCY ASSOCIATIONS, 267, n.
- CONSTITUTION, basis of present, 1—13.
- CONSTITUTIONAL, nature of, what is, 12.
- CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS, character of, as contrasted with law and compared with usages, 2—9.

- CONSTITUTIONAL MONARCHY, character of English, 455—461.
consular service, 219.
- CONSULTATION OF CROWN BEFORE ANNOUNCING POLICY, claim for, unreasonable, 371, 420, 441.
- CONSULTATION OF PARLIAMENT ON FOREIGN TREATIES, 284, 561, 562.
- CONSULTATIONS BY CROWN WITH VIEW TO FORM MINISTRY, 37—44.
- CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE, on Education, 242.
- CONSUMERS' COMMITTEES, 236.
- CONTRACTS, Treasury control of, 193.
- CONTRACTS CO-ORDINATION COMMITTEE, 190.
- CONVENTIONAL BASIS OF CABINET GOVERNMENT, 1—14.
- CONVENTIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION, 2, 3—9.
- CONVERSATIONS WITH FRENCH MILITARY EXPERTS, 91.
- CONVOCATIONS, new precedent as to dissolution of, 9.
- CO-OPERATION between departments, 189—191.
between ministry and opposition leaders, 322—326.
- CO-OPERATIVE UNION CONGRESS, 262.
- CO-ORDINATION OF DEFENCE, ministry for the, 49, 54, 142—144, 145, 190, 228, 229.
- CORN LAWS REPEAL, 323.
- CORONATION CEREMONIES, 1937...455, 456.
- CORONATION DURBAR,
1903...426, 504.
1911—12...427, 507.
- CORONATION OATH IRREGULARITIES, 149, n.
- CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT, 1883...305.
- COTTON INDUSTRY BOARDS, 239.
- COUNCIL, PRIVY, approval of royal speech in, 389, 390.
committees of, 24, 25.
note of summons of, 26.
Orders in, 202, 203.
separated from Cabinet, 24—29.

- COUNCIL OF ACTION, 252.
- COUNCIL OF GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA, addition of Indian member to, 506.
- COUNCILS OF AGRICULTURE, 237.
- COUNSELLORS OF STATE, in 1928, mode of appointment of, 452.
- COUNTY COURT JUDGES, controlled by Lord Chancellor, 207.
- COUNTY COURTS RULE COMMITTEE, 207.
- COUNTY PALATINE OF DURHAM, 246.
- COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER, 243, 246.
- COUPON ELECTION OF 1918...130, 261, n.
- COURTNEY, LEONARD, Under-Secretary of State, 59, 124.
- COURTS OF ENQUIRY INTO TRADE DISPUTES, 239.
- COURTS OF JUSTICE, ministers not responsible for action of, 171, 172.
- COURTS OF REFEREES, 239.
- CRANBORNE, LORD, resigns (1938)...124, 218, 246.
- CRANBROOK, LORD, 76.
- CRETE, union of, with Greece, 488.
- CREWE, MARQUIS OF, 158, 405, 466, 504, 505, n., 548.
- CRIMEAN WAR, 98, 148, 211, 297.
- CRIMINAL APPEAL ACT, 1907...213, 245.
- CRIMINAL APPEALS TO HOUSE OF LORDS, 245.
- CRIPPS, SIR STAFFORD, 262, 408, 445, 461.
- CRITICISM OF THE SOVEREIGN, to be avoided, 357, 362, 366 .
- CROMER, EARL OF, 497.
- CROSS, LORD, Queen Victoria's support of, 61, 500, n.
- CROWE, SIR EYRE, Foreign Office, 179.
- CROWN, THE,
- abdication of, 366—368, 478.
 - appointments by, 532—540.
 - assent of, to Bills, 3, 8, 9, 208, 384, 467.
 - assent to cession of territory by, 281, 282.
 - attitude of people to, 288, 455—457.
 - control of ministers formerly vested in, 19, 20.
 - criticism of, now forbidden, 357, 362, 363, 366.

CROWN, THE—continued.

- defence questions and, 512—522.
- demise of Crown, 368.
- dismissal of ministers by, 9, 361—365, 368.
- dissent in Cabinet revealed to, 412—417.
- dissolution of Parliament by, 287, 288, 291, 391—399.
- divisibility of, 509, 510.
- Dominions and, 391—399. (See DOMINIONS.)
- ecclesiastical policy of, 522—532.
- foreign affairs and, 468—495.
- formation of ministry subject to approval of, 48—62, 358—361.
- forms of, and responsibility for, acts of, 450—454.
- honours prerogative of, 540—552.
- House of Lords' position towards, 399—410.
- Imperial issues and, 495—512.
- impartiality of, 357, 363, 364, 365.
- internal affairs and, 461—468.
- Orders in Council by, 202, 203—205, 451.
- power of, to demand dissolution of Parliament, 370—379.
- Prime Minister's letters to, 411.
- Private Secretaries of, 441—443.
- receives advice on choice of Prime Minister, 365, 366.
- relations of, to—
 - Cabinet, 131, 134, 410—424.
 - Colonial Office, 426, 427.
 - Dominions Office, 426, 427.
 - Foreign Office, 219, 424, 425.
 - Home Office, 212, 428—431.
 - India Office, 425, 426.
 - Lords Commissioners of Admiralty, 427, 428.
 - opposition leaders, 431—441.
- removal of ministers by, 101—108.
- resignation statements of ministers authorised by, 151, 152.
- responsibility of ministers for acts of, 356—368.
- right of intervention in foreign policy affected by Premier's initiative, 385, 560, 561.
- selects Prime Minister, 30—48.
- sheriffs pricked by, 204, 208.
- sources and character of royal influence, 455—461.
- sources of information available to, 441—450.
- speech from the throne, 389—391, 445.
- surrenders sovereignty over Sudan, 219.
- tenure of servants of, 202.
- treaties to be approved by, 384, 385.

CROWN AGENTS FOR THE COLONIES, 222.

CROWN LANDS. (See COMMISSIONERS OF.)

CULLINAN DIAMOND, 503.

CUMBERLAND, DUKE OF, deprived of title, 550, n.

CURZON, G. N. (later Marquis),

- controversy over Lord Kitchener's position, 504, 505, 507.
- does not obtain Premiership, 7, 32—34, 43.
- Governor-General of India, 420.
- is refused peerage, 543.
- Lord President of the Council, 55.
- on Committee of Imperial Defence, 141.

- CURZON, G. N.—continued. position of, in 1910—1911...309, 310.
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 80, 81, 94, 95, 113, 152.
supports acceptance of Parliament Act, 406.
referendum, 342, 344.
Under-Secretary of State, Foreign Office, 51, n.
views of—
on honours, 546.
on Indian policy, 499.
- CURRAGH INCIDENT (1914), 380—382, 428.
- CUSTOMS AND EXCISE. (See BOARD OF.)
- CYPRUS, offered to Greece, 282.
- CZECHOSLOVAKIA,
failure of Britain and France to honour obligations towards, 265, 284, 554, 555.
results of, 555—559.
- DAILY CHRONICLE, control of, acquired by Mr. Lloyd George, 276.
- DAILY HERALD, organ of Labour, 264.
- DAILY TELEGRAPH, interview with Kaiser published in, 490.
- DALADIER, E., French Premier, breaks faith with Czechoslovakia, 555.
- DANBY, SIR THOMAS, impeached, 14, 358.
- DANGERS TO DEMOCRACY, revealed by Czechoslovakia crisis, 553, 559—566.
- DARDANELLES, attacked, 99, 157, 158.
- DARDANELLES COMMITTEE, 1915...133, 158.
- DAVIDSON, RANDALL, Archbishop of Canterbury, 367, 444, 525, 526 527, 528.
- DAVIDSON, C. J., Viscount, 243.
- DE GREY, LORD, 59.
- DE LA WARR, EARL, Lord Privy Seal, 55.
- DE VALERA, E., establishes sovereignty of Eire, 340, 410, 509.
- DEANS, appointment of, 525.
- DEANERY OF WINDSOR, royal selection for, 525.
- DEBT SETTLEMENT WITH UNITED STATES, Mr. Bonar Law opposed to, 83, 560.
- DECLARATION AGAINST TRANSUBSTANTIATION, royal 420, 530.

- DECLARATORY ACTIONS AGAINST ATTORNEY-GENERAL, 245.
- DEFEAT OF GOVERNMENT AT ELECTION, RESULTS IN RESIGNATION, 9, 287, 289, 292, 298, 397.
- DEFEAT OF GOVERNMENT IN HOUSE OF COMMONS, how far demanding dissolution or resignation, 296—299.
imposes duty on opposition to take office, 38, 45, 46, 306, 307, 315.
- DEFENCE. (See also Co-ordination of Defence.)
- DEFENCE, MINISTER OF, proposal for, 141—144.
- DEFENCE OF THE REALM ACTS, 141.
- DEFENCE POLICY,
Crown control of, 512—522.
secrecy of matters relating to, 303, 304.
- DEFENCE POLICY AND REQUIREMENTS COMMITTEE OF THE CABINET, 143.
- DEFERENCE OF ELECTORS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, 251—253.
- DELCASSE, THÉOPHILE, concludes entente in 1904...484, 485.
- DELHI, becomes capital of India (1912), 427, 507.
- DEMobilisation Committee, 1918—1919...159.
- DEMOCRACIES, behind date in defence preparations, 289, 522.
- DEMOCRACY, conditions of success of, 12, 13, 321, 322.
connected with party system, 256—278.
failure of, at Munich, 1938...553—566.
growth of, 14—24.
ought to be warned of dangers by leaders, 289, 290.
safeguards for, 331, 332—355.
uncertainty of outlook for, 384—386.
Victoria and Edward VII., not in sympathy with, 462—465.
- DENMARK, 335, 471, 476, 482.
- DENMARK, KING OF, K.G. for, 551.
- DENSHAWI CASE, 116, n.
- DENTAL BOARD, 205.
- DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, Scotland, 216.
- DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, Scotland, 216, 240.
- DEPARTMENTAL DIFFERENCES, Prime Minister's position as to, 96—101, 106, 107.
- DEPUTY CHIEF OF THE IMPERIAL GENERAL STAFF, 225, n.

DEPUTY CHIEF OF THE NAVAL STAFF, now Fifth Sea Lord, 227, 228.

DERBY, FOURTEENTH EARL OF, advises Queen Victoria as to successor, 37, 42.

dissolution of Parliament by, 393, 394.
ecclesiastical appointments by, 523, 524.
personal appeal of, to electorate, 313.
position of—

in 1855...37, 38, 45.
in 1859—1865...324.

Prime Minister—

in 1852...31, 35, 37, 42, 45, 60, 67.
in 1858—1859...31, 38, 45.
in 1866—1868...31, 34, 38, 68, 69.

receives Garter, 548.

resigns office in 1852...297.

resigns office in 1859...297.

views of, on Indian army, 501, 502.

DERBY, FIFTEENTH EARL OF, 61, n., 76, 91, 132, 137, 152.

DERBY, SIXTEENTH EARL OF, 52, 99, 540, n.

DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION, 231.

DEVONSHIRE, EIGHTH DUKE OF, formerly Lord Hartington, 308, 311, n.

DICEY, PROFESSOR, A. V., on dissolution of Parliament, 377.

DIFFERENCES OF OPINIONS IN CABINET REPORTED TO CROWN, 414—417.

DILKE, SIR CHARLES, 57, 61, 122, 460, 465.

DILLWYN, L., attacks on prerogative, 461, n.

DINDINGS, surrender of, to Johore, 282.

DIPLOMATIC AGENTS,

British—

controlled by Foreign Secretary, 218.

Crown's share in appointment of, 534, 535.

political considerations affecting tenure of, 183.

question of competence of, 480, 481.

of foreign powers, protection of rights of, 214.

DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF MUNITIONS PRODUCTION, 225, n.

DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE TERRITORIAL ARMY, 225.

DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS, 117, 246.

DIRECTORSHIPS, tenure of, by Ministers, 186, 187.

DISCOVERY COMMITTEE, for Antarctic research, 221.

DISESTABLISHMENT OF CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN WALES, 258, 343, 391, 527.

DISESTABLISHMENT OF CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, proposed, 258, 529, 530.

DISESTABLISHMENT OF THE IRISH CHURCH, 113, 323, 342.
Queen Victoria's mediation in, 436.

DISMISSAL OF CIVIL SERVANTS AT ROYAL PLEASURE, 202.

DISMISSAL OF MINISTERS, principles affecting, 9, 368—391.
1783...9, 19, 20, 356.
1807...9, 20, 356, 368.

DISRAELI, B., EARL OF BEACONSFIELD, aims at Cabinet unity, 126.
appeals to people, 84, 253.
as Prime Minister, 75, 76, 77, 100.
becomes party leader, 272.
commits colleagues without consent, 112.
corresponds with Queen Victoria after resignation, 432.
dissolves in 1880 ..293, 300, 397.
does not receive honours in 1868...541, n.
foreign policy of, 90, 91, 477, 478, 481.
position of, in 1851...59.
Prime Minister—
in 1868.. 34, 38, 69.
in 1874—1880...31, 38, 69.
refuses to become Prime Minister in 1873...38, 45, 46, 306, 307, 315.
resigns in 1868...9, 297, 299.
secures Queen title of Empress of India, 496.
success of, at Berlin Congress, 562, 563.
threatens dissolution, 474.
uses Queen Victoria, 387, 477, 478, 492.
views of—
on ecclesiastical policy and appointments, 523, 526, 527.
on electoral issues, 314.
on party organisation, 545.
on position of Crown, 458, 459.
on Queen's speech, 389.
on weakness of forces, 515.

DISRAELI, MRS., peerage for, 542, n.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT,
as means of controlling House of Commons, 268.
caused by—defeat in Commons, 290.
efflux of time, 288—290.
formation of new Government, 290—292.
new issues arising, 292, 293.
tactical considerations, 293—304.
discussion of propriety of, in 1938...563, 564.
duty of grant of, 47.
principles of, 7, 8, 287, 391—399.
misunderstood by Lord Melbourne, 23.
refusal of, when possible, 291, 393—396.
suggestion of, by Crown, 370, 371, 372.
time for, 288.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT— continued.

when resignation may be preferred by ministers, 287, 289, 292, 298, 397.

list of cases of grant of—

- 1806...393.
- 1807...294, 393.
- 1830...65, 290.
- 1831...65, 290, 393.
- 1832...65.
- 1835...65.
- 1837...66.
- 1841...66, 287, 288, 289.
- 1847...66, 67, 291.
- 1852...67, 291, 292.
- 1857...67, 290, 474.
- 1859...68, 290.
- 1865...68, 288.
- 1868...69, 257, 290.
- 1874...69, 288, 397.
- 1880...69, 293.
- 1885...69, 70, 72, 292.
- 1886...70, 290.
- 1892...70, 465.
- 1895...70, 292.
- 1900...70, 293, 333, 397.
- 1905...71, 333, 397.
- 1909...71, 292, 397.
- 1910...71, 292, 397.
- 1918...72, 293, 333, 398.
- 1922...72, 333.
- 1923...72, 290, 292, 333, 334, 398.
- 1924...72, 290, 334, 395, 398.
- 1929...72, 290, 334.
- 1931...73, 292, 334, 398.
- 1935...73, 288, 334, 335.

DIVISION OF THE CROWN, 509, 510.

DIVORCE LAW REFORM UNION, 317, n.

DODSON, J. G., removal from office of, 108.

DOGGER BANK INCIDENT, 1904...486.

DOMINION AFFAIRS, Secretary of State for, 49, 141, 150, 190, 211, 220—223.

DOMINION REPRESENTATION AT WAR CABINET, 159, 160.

DOMINIONS,

communications with Imperial Government, 221.

Crown—

as bond of union between, 456.

limited functions of, 509.

discussions with, as to abdication of Edward VIII., 89, 366.

divisibility of Crown in, 509, 510.

Imperial Defence Committee used by, 140.

Imperial Government's policy of concessions to, 178, 179.

Irish Free State, 311, n.

Italian treaty of 1938, accepted by two only, 566.

DOMINIONS.—continued.

 neutralitv, right of, 221, 509.
 Prime Ministers in conference, 159, 160.
 question of abdication of King as affecting, 389.
 secession, right of, 221, 509.
 status of, 427, 508—510.
 treaties affecting, forms of, 453.
 wishes of, as strengthening King against British Ministers, 389.

DREADNOUGHTS, policy of constructing, 195, 196, 520.

DUCKWORTH, DR., preferment of, 526.

DUFF COOPER, A.,

Haig, 161.
 resignation of, in 1938...561, 565.

DUFFERIN, MARQUIS OF, action as to Pacific Railway scandal by, 369, 370.

DUKE OF CORNWALL'S LIGHT INFANTRY, red pagri for, 549.

DUMA, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's defence of, 489.

DURHAM, County Palatine, 246.

DUTIES OF SOLDIERS, rules as to, 381, 382.

EARLY CLOSING ASSOCIATION, 317, n.

ECCLESIASTICAL AND CHURCH ESTATE COMMISSIONERS, 171, 249.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS MEASURE, 249.

ECCLESIASTICAL PATRONAGE OF CROWN, 524—529.

ECCLESIASTICAL PROPERTY, 249.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES BILL, AND ACT, 112, 523, 532.

ECKARDSTEIN, BARON VON, 483.

ECONOMIC ADVISORY COUNCIL, 150, 151, 355.

EDEN, ANTHONY, 51, 54, 82, 96, 108, n., 123, 124, 127, 182, 209, 218, 246, 269, 487, 557, 558, 565.

EDUCATION,

 control over—

 Board of Education, 241—243.
 Civil Service Commission, 184.
 Home Office, 215.

EDUCATION ACT, 1902...308.

EDUCATION BILL 1906—1908...308, 324.

EDWARD VII.,

 abdication suggested by, 388.
 advocates moderation of speech, 417, 418.
 Cabinet letter to, 411.

EDWARD VII.—continued.

- devotion to duty of, 457.
- expects courtesy from ministers, 423.
- interviews—
 - opposition leaders, 405.
 - representatives of foreign powers, 450.
- relations of—
 - with Admiralty, 428, 446.
 - with Colonial Office, 426, 427.
 - with India Office, 426, 427.
 - with Foreign Office, 425.
 - with War Office, 428, 447.
- seeks to promote army and naval preparations, 516—520.
- selects Prime Minister, 41, 42, 48.
- shares in formation of ministry, 61, 62.
- undemocratic tendencies of, 465.
- views of—
 - in 1905...147.
 - on appointments, 535, 536, 537.
 - on Colonies and Dominions, 502—504.
 - on ecclesiastical appointments, 528.
 - on Finance Bill, 1909...372.
 - on foreign affairs, 482—492, 495.
 - on grants of medals, 549.
 - on honours, 543, 544.
 - on Indian affairs, 119, 324, 504—507.
 - on internal affairs, 465, 466, 467.
 - on Ireland, 511, 512.
 - on Parliament Bill, 403, 404.
 - on prerogative of pardon, 429.
 - on question of dissolution, 394.
 - on Roman Catholic Church, 530, 531, 532.
 - on salutes, 550.
 - on speech from the throne, 390, 391.
- violation of rules of law by, 551, 552.
- wishes to secure reform of House of Lords, 466.

EDWARD VIII.

- abdication of, 34, 89, 362, 366—368, 398, 509, 511.
- effect of abdication on royal power, 385.
- lack of cordiality to Prime Minister, 422.
- out of touch with Labour Party, 445.
- Private Secretary of, 442.
- tours distressed areas, 423.
- unfortunate circumstances of abdication of, 461.

EFFICIENT CABINET, 26, 27.EGYPT, 192, 496. (See also SUDAN.)

British army in, 515.

EIRE, CONSTITUTION OF,

- agreement of 1938 with, 280, 281.
- Dáil chooses Comptroller and Auditor-General, 170.
- elimination of Crown from authority over, 323, 324, 394, 410, 441.
- mode of concluding treaties for, 453.
- neutrality of, 280, 281, 509.
- proportional representation in, 336, 340.
- secession, right of, 509.
- separate Crown of, 510.

- ELECTIONS, doubtful mandates from, 304—313, 379.
- ELECTIONS AND REGISTRATION OF VOTERS, under Home Secretary, 215, 240.
- ELECTORATE,
control choice of Prime Minister, 83, 84.
Prime Minister's appeal to, in 1938...562, 563.
relations of, to Cabinet, 251—256, 327.
dissolution, 287—304.
mandate, 304—313.
- ELECTRICITY COMMISSIONERS, 237, 250.
- ELECTRICITY (SUPPLY) ACT, 1919...237.
- ELGIN, NINTH EARL OF, 57, 59, 62, 105, 427, 533, 534.
- ELIBANK, MASTER OF, 266.
- ELIZABETH, QUEEN, wife of George VI., honours conferred on, 548, n.
- ELLENBOROUGH, LORD, L.C.J., in Cabinet, 27, 28.
- ELLENBOROUGH, LORD, resigns from Cabinet in 1858...301.
- ELLIOT, SIR H., 183.
- ELLIOT, WALTER, 269.
- EMERGENCIES, position of Prime Minister as to, 96, 97.
- EMERGENCY POWERS ACT, 1920 ..204, 214.
- EMMOTT, CHARLES, M.P., 266, 267.
- EMPIRE TIMBERS COMMITTEE, 221.
- EMPEROR AUGUSTA, 478.
- EMPEROR FREDERICK, 478.
- ENCIRCLEMENT OF GERMANY, plan for, absurdly attributed to Edward VII., 488, n., 491, 492.
- ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS, 242, 249.
- ESHER, VISCOUNT, 6, 12, 41, 42, 144, n., 180, 185, n., 373, 402, 403, 420, 443, 490, n., 514, 517.
- ESTABLISHMENT OFFICERS, in civil service, 201.
- ESTATE COMMISSIONERS, 249.
- ESTIMATES, Treasury control over, 192—196.
- ETHIOPIA, 82, 106, 136, 220, 282, 283, 289, 312, 332, 384, 385, 422.
final betrayal of, by Britain, 553, 558.

- EVOLUTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS, 14—24.
EXCESS VOTES, 199, 200.
EXCHANGE EQUALISATION FUND, 232.
EXCHEQUER AND AUDIT DEPARTMENT. (See Comptroller and Auditor-General.) EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF IMPERIAL AGRICULTURAL BUREAUX 221.
EXPENDITURE, Treasury authority over, 192—202.
EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES ACT, 188. 215.
EXTENSION OF LIFE OF PARLIAMENT, royal assent to, 384.
EXTENT AND CHARACTER OF CABINET CONTROL OF PARLIAMENT, 278—287.
EXTENT AND CHARACTER OF MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR ADMINISTRATION, 167—172, 368—391.
EXTRADITION ACTS, 1870—1932 .214.
EXTRA-PARLIAMENTARY ACTION TO INFLUENCE GOVERNMENTAL POLICY, 252, 253.
EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION IN CHINA, &c., 219.

FAILURE TO WARN ELECTORATE OF FOREIGN DANGERS, 289 290.
FASCISM, Mr. Chamberlain's sympathies with, 564.
FASHODA, affair of, 479.
FATAL GUN, skit, 516.
FAWCETT, HENRY, 124.
FEES ON HONOURS, abolished, 552.
FEMALE SUFFRAGE, 257, 258, 311, 317, n., 467.
FENIAN PRISONERS IN CANADA, pardon of, 426, n.
FERDINAND II., King of the Two Sicilies, 470, 471.
FERDINAND OF BULGARIA, PRINCE, 485.
FIAT TO PETITION OF RIGHT, 212, 245.
FIFE, EARL OF (later Duke), 61, 541.
FIJI, Queen Victoria refuses to alter name of, 496.

- FINANCE BILL, 1909...309.
FINANCE COMMITTEE OF CABINET, 148.
FINANCIAL OBSTACLES TO CONDUCT OF GOVERNMENT AGAINST WILL OF COMMONS, 8, 408.
FINANCIAL SECRETARY,
 Treasury, 49, 172, 194, 230.
 War office, 225, 241.
FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS, 49, 53, 65, 241.
FIRST LORD OF ADMIRALTY, 49, 52, 65, 139, 141, 143, 227, 228.
FIRST LORD OF TREASURY, 17, 86, 229, 230.
FIRST SEA LORD, Admiralty, 139, 206, 227, 228.
FISHER, ADMIRAL SIR JOHN, LORD, 99, 157, 228, 446, 489, 518, 520.
FISHER, ANDREW, Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, 345.
FISHERY BOARD, Scotland, 216.
FITZROY, SIR A., 395.
FLEET, BRITISH, mobilisation of, in 1938, affects position, 561.
FLEET AIR ARM, control of, 98, 228.
FOOD, MINISTRY OF, 162, n.
FORCING A DISSOLUTION, King's position as to, 370—379.
FOREIGN AFFAIRS, 90—96, 217—220, 281—285, 468—495, 553—566.
 Secretary of State for, 49, 54, 77, 80, 81, 82, 87, 90—96, 131, 135, 141, 178, 179, 210, 211, 217—220, 221.
FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT, 1870...213, 214.
FOREIGN JURISDICTION ACT, 1890...204.
FOREIGN MEDALS, restrictions on acceptance of, 549.
FOREIGN SOVEREIGNS, orders for, 544, 550, 551.
FORESTRY ACT, 1919...236.
FORESTRY COMMISSION, 171, 231, 236.
FORM OF DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT, 391, 392.
FORMAL MINUTES OF CABINET, 132.
FORMS OF EXPRESSION OF ROYAL ACTION, 450—454.
FORMULATION OF ISSUES, 313—320.

- FORSTER, W. E., 39, 105, 120, 437.
- FOX, C. J., 19, 28, 305, 356.
- FRANCE, 33, 140, 281, 341, 348, 468, 469, 470, 473, 475, 477, 479, 482, 484, 487, 493.
 betrays Czechoslovakia, 553—559.
- FRANCIS II., King of the Two Sicilies, 476.
- FRANCIS JOSEPH, Emperor of Austria, 470, 485, 488, 490.
- FRENCH, SIR JOHN (later Viscount and Earl of Ypres), 137, 157, 165, 180, 181, 182, 323, 521.
- FRENCH CHAMBER, controls Ministry, 295.
- FRERE, SIR BARTLE, Disraeli's refusal to recall, 76, 126, 182.
- FRIENDLY SOCIETIES' REGISTRY, 231.
- FUGITIVE OFFENDERS ACT, 1881...232.
- FULL POWERS FOR SIGNATURE AND RATIFICATION OF TREATIES, 208, 211, 219, 453.
- FUNCTIONAL DEVOLUTION, schemes of, 354, 355.
- FUSHIMI, PRINCE, honours shown to, 544.
- GAEKWAR OF BARODA, 499, 504.
- GALLIPOLI DISASTER, responsibility for, 99.
- GARIBALDI, Italian patriot, 476.
- GARTER, Order of the, bestowal of—
 on foreign sovereigns (given to Kings of Hellenes and Rumania in November, 1938)...484, 487, 494, 544, 551.
 on ministers, 61, n., 548.
- GAS UNDERTAKINGS, control of, 235.
- GEDDES, SIR ERIC, on national economy, 141.
- GENERAL BOARD OF CONTROL, Scotland, 216.
- GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE TRADES UNION CONGRESS, 265.
- GENERAL ELECTIONS. (See also DISSOLUTION.) issues at, 313—320.
 mandates asked for at, 304—313.
 uncertain results of, 342.
- GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL, 205.
- GENERAL REGISTER DEPARTMENT, Scotland, 216.

GENERAL REGISTER OFFICE, 240.

GENERAL STRIKE, 1926...253.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY, 206.

GEORGE I., 16, 17, 358.

GEORGE II., 17, 358, 359, 532.

GEORGE III.,

Church of England upheld by, 24.

dislikes party, 27.

personal policy of, 18, 19, 357, 359, 360.

Private Secretary of, 441.

secures retirement of Grenville ministry, 19, 132, 304, 356, 368, 369, 502.

summary dismissal of Fox-North ministry by, 19, 356.

GEORGE IV.,

asks for individual opinion of ministers, 412.

Church of England and, 24.

controls ministers, 20.

interviews of, with foreign ambassadors, 449.

Private Secretary of, 441.

reluctantly accepts Catholic emancipation, 24, 529.

GEORGE V.,

appoints Poet Laureate, 537.

appoints Prime Ministers, 32—34, 42, 43, 44.

appoints other ministers, 62.

Cabinet letter to, 411.

devoted to duty, 457.

does not threaten abdication, 388.

information supplied to, 421, 422.

loyal to Church of Scotland, 530.

position of—

 in 1910—1911...324, 373, 404—407.

 in 1913—1914...373—378.

Private Secretary of, 442.

undertakes obligations under League Covenant, Art. 20...385.

views of—

 on defence, 521, 522.

 on foreign affairs, 494, 495.

 on Indian affairs, 507.

 on internal issues, 458.

 on Ireland, 512.

 on physical education, 423.

 on uniforms, 550.

 on war services of Sir D. Haig, 536.

wise guidance of, missed in 1938...565.

GEORGE VI.,

accession to throne of, 368.

devotion to duty of, 457.

interest of, in public affairs, 422.

lack of touch with Labour, 445, 446.

Private Secretary of, 442.

recognises Ethiopian conquest in defiance of League covenant, 385, 494, 509, n., 553, 558.

surrenders claim of sovereignty over Sudan, 219.

unable to intervene in treatment of Czechoslovakia, 560, 561, 565.

GEORGE II., King of Greece, 495.

GERMAN FEDERAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL, 354.

GERMANY, 218, 220, 283, 477, 478, 479, 482, 487, 489, 490.

forces surrender of Czechoslovakia, 553—559.

just claim for return of colonies, 558, 566.

GIBRALTAR, Spanish menace to, 450, n., 479.

GLADSTONE, HERBERT, VISCOUNT,

Governor-General of the Union of South Africa, 423, 504, 535.
on Queen Victoria's hostility to his father, 463.

GLADSTONE, W. E.,

appeals to people, 84, 253, 313.

appointments by, 534.

as Prime Minister, 75, 76, 77, 78.

1868—1874 ..69.

1880—1885...34, 36, 38, 69.

1886...38, 39, 40, 70.

1892—1894...40, 41, 70, 258, 465.

commits party, 112, 113.

election manifesto of, 319, 320.

establishes financial supremacy of Commons, 402.

foreign policy of, 468, 476, 481.

honours given by, 536, n., 542, 543.

honours refused by, 548.

loyal to party, 86.

not consulted as to successor, 42, 365.

objects to Parnell Commission, 13.

party leader, 272, 273.

policy of, in Egypt, 497, 515.

position of—

in Aberdeen's ministry, 129.

in 1873...45, 46, 298.

resigns office—

in 1874...9, 10, 299.

in 1885...298.

in 1886...298, 300.

secures dissolution—

in 1874...9, 10, 397.

in 1886...298.

secures royal aid in redistribution question, 437.

views of—

on appointments in Church of England, 525.

on cession of territory, 281.

on colonial constitutions, 4.

on conduct of Cabinet business, 131.

on consultation of Cabinet in certain cases, 56, 118, 119, 533.

on democracy, 461.

on dismissal of ministers, 102.

on duty to take office, 45, 46.

on Irish Church, 436.

on issues, 313, 314.

on legal position of Under-Secretaries, 59.

on mandate, 306, 307, 308.

on neutrality of Belgium, 93.

on popular judgment, 256.

GLADSTONE, W. E.—continued.

views of—

- on qualifications of ministers, 175.
- on relations of Russell and Palmerston, 425.
- on resignation statements of ministers, 152.
- on suitability of peer for Premiership, 31, 32.
- on unanimity, 29, 221.
- on William IV.'s action in 1834...389.

visit to Denmark, disapproved by Queen, 423.

GLENavy, LORD, 539.

GODERICH, LORD, 65.

GODESBERG, German terms offered at, 555.

GODOLPHIN, LORD, 16.

GOLUCHOWSKI, COUNT, Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, 485.

GORDON, GENERAL,

- Queen Victoria's indignation at death of, 444, 497.
- sent to Egypt, 496.

GOSCHEN, G. J., VISCOUNT, 39, 40, 60, 107, 116, 397, 433, 440.

GOSCHEN, SIR E., appointed to Berlin, 535.

GOUGH, SIR HUBERT, erroneous action of, 381, 382.

GOULBURN, MR., 76.

GOVERNMENT ACTUARY, 231.

GOVERNMENT LYMPH ESTABLISHMENT, 240.

GOVERNMENT OF BURMA ACT, 1935, 211, 223, 508.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT,

- 1919...223, 507.
- 1935. .211, 223, 427, 508.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL, 1912—1914...324, 363, 373—378, 439, 467.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL IN THE DOMINIONS,

- appointment of, 533.
- commission of, 452.
- direct communications from, to Crown, 447.
- dismissal of Ministers by, 369, 370.
- refusal of dissolution by, 379, 396.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA,

- action of—
 - in Pacific Railway scandal, 369, 370.
 - in 1926 crisis, 379, 396.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA,

- controversy over army, 505, 506, 507.
- direct communications with Crown, 447, 448, 449.
- form of commission of, 452.

represents Crown in relations with Indian States, 224.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA'S COUNCIL, admission of Indian member to, 418, 506.

GOVERNORS OVERSEAS,
commissions of, 452.
political considerations affecting tenure of office of, 182, 183.

GRAFTON, DUKE OF,
denies necessity of Prime Minister, 19.
on confidential Cabinet, 26.
outvoted in Cabinet, 27.

GRAHAM, SIR JAMES, 76.

GRAHAM, WILLIAM, Labour leader, 31, 247, n.

GRAND OR HONORARY CABINET, 27.

GRANVILLE, EARL, 34, n., 35, 59, 91, 126, 183, 184, 365, n., 370, 397, 463, 476, 481.

GRAYSON, VICTOR, M.P., 489.

GREAT COUNCIL, name of Privy Council, 25.

GREAT SEAL, under control of Lord Chancellor, 207.

GREAT SEAL OF SCOTLAND, 216.

GREAT WAR,
British position as regards outbreak of, 93.
financial arrangements in, 199.
part played by George V. in, 521, 522.
secret session of Parliament, 304.

GREECE, 450, 472, 478, 488. offer of Cyprus to, 282.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL, 228.

GREINDL, BARON, on alleged encirclement of Germany, 488, n.

GRENVILLE, GEORGE, Ministry, 1763—1765...26.

GRENVILLE MINISTRY, 1806—1807...9, 19, 20, 132, 304, 356, 360, 368, 369, 393, 502.

GREVILLE, C., Memoirs, value of, 11, 64.

GREY, SIR EDWARD, VISCOUNT, 32, 57, 62, 91, 93, 94, 100, 114, 115, 123, 127, 128, 137, 418, 459, 461, 490, 491.

GREY, EARL,
furthers Parliamentary reform, 20.
position of—
in 1830...46.
in 1831...393, 401.
in 1830—1832...65, 327.

GREY, THIRD EARL, 66, 470.

GREY, GENERAL, Private Secretary to Queen Victoria, 442.

GROWTH OF CABINET RESPONSIBILITY, 14—24, 356—366.

GUIDE TO CURRENT OFFICIAL STATISTICS, 191.

GUARANTEE OF CZECHOSLOVAKIAN TERRITORIES, given by Mr. Chamberlain, worthlessness of, 555, 556.

HABIBULLAH OF AFGHANISTAN, 489, 505.

HAIG, F. M., SIR DOUGLAS (later Earl), 80, 99, 115, 130, n., 164, 165, 181, 182, 303, 521, 538, 552.

HAILSHAM, VISCOUNT, 52, 121.

HALDANE, R. B., VISCOUNT, 32, 57, 91, 141, 156, 189, 310, 403, 428, 519.

HALE, W. B., Kaiser's interview with, 490.

HALIFAX, MARQUIS OF, 17.

HALIFAX, SECOND VISCOUNT, 513.

HALIFAX, THIRD VISCOUNT, Viceroy of India, and Foreign Secretary, 51, 82, 83, 127, 312, 553, 559.

HALLAM, HENRY, on Cabinet responsibility, 28.

HALSBURY, EARL OF, 407, 530.

HAMILTON, LORD GEORGE, 417, 426.

HAMPDEN, DR., promotion of, 525.

HANKEY, COL. SIR MAURICE, 133, 147, n.

HANOVER, relations of, to Britain, 510.

HANOVER, HOUSE OF,

Cabinet under, 26.

responsibility of ministers under, 358, 359, 362.

HARBOURS, control of, 238.

HARCOURT, L. V., VISCOUNT, 418, 520.

HARCOURT, SIR WILLIAM,

Chancellor of the Exchequer, 195.

on position of Prime Minister, 83.

position of—

in 1892...40.

in 1894—1895...31, 35, 318, 423, n.

in 1895...397.

resigns leadership in 1898...272, n.

uncertainty of Cabinet decisions noted by, 131.

- HARDINGE, SIR CHARLES, 426, 488, 490. appointed Viceroy, 118, n.
- HARINGTON, SIR C., in command in Turkey, 107.
- HARTINGTON, LORD (later eighth Duke of Devonshire), 34, 35, 39, 46, 70, 122, 139, 174, 272, 307, 365, n., 373, 379, 464, 515.
- HARTINGTON COMMISSION ON WAR OFFICE, 225, 419, 513.
- HATZFELDT, COUNT, 483.
- HAYNAU, GENERAL, attacked in London, 472.
- HEAD, SIR E., Governor of Canada, 496.
- HEALTH, MINISTRY OF, 49, 189, 191, 239—241.
- HELIGOLAND, surrender cf. in 1890...281, 482, n.
- HENDERSON, A., 58, 95, 138, 182.
- HENLEIN, HERR, Sudeten German leader, 554.
- HENRY, SIR EDWARD, Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, 248, n., 430.
- HENRY OF BATTENBERG, PRINCE, 549, n.
- HENRY OF PRUSSIA, PRINCE, 495.
- HERBERT, A. P., M.P., 247, 267.
- HERBERT, SIR A., 535.
- HEREDITARY ELEMENT IN HOUSE OF LORDS, objections to, 329, 330.
- HERKOMER, H. VON., honour for, 543.
- HERRING INDUSTRY BOARD, 237.
- HERSCHELL, LORD, rejected as Lord-in-Waiting, 61.
- HEWART, GORDON H., LORD, 117.
- HICKS BEACH, SIR M., Earl of St. Aldwyn, 76, 77, 195.
- HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR BASUTOLAND, THE BECHUANALAND PROTECTORATE, AND SWAZILAND, 220.
- HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA, 224.
- HIGH COMMISSIONERS OF DOMINIONS, 550.
- HIS MAJESTY'S DECLARATION OF ABDICATION ACT, 1936...367, 368.

- HITLER, HERR A., German Führer, 124, 153, 289, 312, 553, 554, 555, 556, 559, 560, 561, 563.
- HOARE, SIR SAMUEL, Foreign, and later Home, Secretary, 51, 54, 82, 96, 106, 282, 283, 302, 384, 385, 564.
- HOARE-LAVAL TERMS FOR ETHIOPIAN ACCORD, 82, 96, 106, 136, 282, 311, 384, 385, 422, 425.
- HOGG, SIR DOUGLAS, Attorney-General, in Cabinet, 56. (See also HAILSHAM.)
- HOLKAR, of Indore, 499, 519.
- HOME AFFAIRS, Secretary of State for, 49, 141, 143, 168, 189, 190, 204, n., 210, 211—215, 239, 428—430, 456, 564.
- HOME AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF CABINET, 148.
- HOME RULE FOR IRELAND, constitutional issues of, 113, 258—270, 298, 307, 308, 309, 310, 314, 316, 322, 323, 324, 343, 370—372, 410, 464, 465, 467.
- HOME RULERS, 69.
- HONOUR,
prerogative of, 118, 119, 230, 540—552.
corrupt practices in respect of political, 544—548.
- HONOURS (PREVENTION OF ABUSES) ACT, 1923...547.
- HORE-BELISHA, L., Secretary of State for War, 52, 564, n.
- HOTEL CECIL UNLIMITED, 104, 528, n
- HOUSE, COL., 155, n.
- HOUSE OF COMMONS,
censured Lord Milner, 503. control—
of estimates by, 198—199, 200.
of foreign affairs by, 218, 494, 495.
extent and character of Cabinet control over, 278—287.
limited control of Cabinet by, 251—256, 278, 279.
members subject to party control, 265—269.
refrains from interference in executive affairs, 348, n. relations with House of Lords, 308, 309, 327—331, 338, 341, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 399—410, 438, 439, 465, 487. supremacy over House of Lords established by Parliament Act, 1911...33. (See also PARLIAMENT ACT.) unable to exercise any control in matter of Czechoslovakia, 555, 561—565.
views of, on honours, 545.
- HOUSE OF COMMONS DISQUALIFICATION (DECLARATION OF LAW) ACT, 1935...54.
- HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICERS, control of, 249, 250.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Cabinet's relations to, 327—331.
controversy with House of Commons, 308, 309, 327—331, 338, 341, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 399—410.
evasion of control of, on army purchase, 513.
growing conservatism of, 33.
ministers in, 51.
relations of, to House of Commons, 7. schemes of reform of, 260, 328—330.
swamping of, 24.
views of—
 on honours, 545, 546.
 on Palestine, 557.

HOUSE OF LORDS OFFICERS, control of, 249, 250.HOWARD DE WALDEN, LORD, 183.HOWICK, LORD, on ministerial responsibility, 360.HOWTH GUN-RUNNING INCIDENT (1914), 380, n.HUNGARY, 471.

 obtains Czechoslovak territory, 556, 562.

HYDERABAD, 224.IDDESLEIGH, EARL OF, 91, n., 107, 108.ILLEGAL PROCESSION OF ROMAN CATHOLICS IN 1908...421, n., 530, 531.IMPEACHMENT OF MINISTERS, 28, 173.IMPERIAL AGRICULTURAL BUREAUX, 221.IMPERIAL AIRWAYS, 227.IMPERIAL CONFERENCE, 1926...280, 508.

 1929...280.

 1930...280, 508.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE COLLEGE, 146, 422.IMPERIAL DEFENCE COMMITTEE. (See also COMMITTEE OF IMPERIAL DEFENCE.)IMPERIAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE, 221.IMPERIAL FORESTRY INSTITUTE, 221.IMPERIAL GENERAL STAFF, 163.IMPERIAL INSTITUTE, 221.IMPERIAL MYCOLOGICAL INSTITUTE, 221.

- IMPERIAL SHIPPING COMMITTEE, 221.
IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE, 112, 156.
IMPERIAL WAR MUSEUM, 242.
IMPORT DUTIES ACT, 1932...234.
IMPORT DUTIES ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 231.
INCITEMENT TO DISAFFECTION BILL, AND ACT, 1934...245, 285.
INDEPENDENT LABOUR PARTY, 74, 263, 271.
INDEPENDENT LIBERALS, 74.
INDEPENDENTS, 73, 74.
INDIA, 223, 224, 425—427, 489, 499—502, 504—508.
Secretary of State for, 49, 97, 176, 177, 211, 425—427, 508, 540.
INDIAN ARMY,
controversy over relation to Crown of, 501.
question of relation of Commander-in-Chief and Indian Government, 505, 506.
INDIAN EMPIRE, Order of the, 500, 540.
INDIAN MEMBER OF VICEROY'S COUNCIL, 418, 506.
INDIAN REFORMS, 280, 506—508.
INDIAN SOCIOLOGIST, proceedings against, 506.
INDIAN STATES, Crown's relations with, 223, 224, 499, 504, 508.
INDIAN TROOPS AT JUBILEE CELEBRATIONS OF 1897...500.
INDIFFERENCE AND IGNORANCE OF ELECTORATE, 253, 254.
INDUSTRIAL COURT, 239.
INFLUENCE OF THE CROWN, sources and character of, 455—461.
INFORMATION,
sources of, open to King, 379, 441—450.
to be supplied to Prime Minister by colleagues, 97.
INGRAM, DR. WINNINGTON, Bishop of London, 528.
INITIATIVE OF CROWN AS TO POLITICAL ACTION, 422, 423.
INNER CABINET, 136—139, 140, 141.
INSKIP, SIR THOMAS, 142, 303, 422.
INSTITUTE OF INDUSTRIAL ART, 235.
INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS, 240.

- INTERNATIONAL POSTAL UNION, 234.
- INVERGORDON, Naval Mutiny at (1931), 253, 383.
- INVERNESS, COUNTESS OF, wife of Duke of Sussex, 368.
- IRELAND. (See also EIRE, NORTHERN IRELAND.) neglect of, by Queen Victoria, 510, 511.
proposal to find Prince of Wales employment in, 510, 511.
visit of Edward VII. to, 511.
disestablishment of Church of England in, 113, 323, 342, 414, 436
- IRISH FREE STATE, Constitution of 1921...311, 336, 509.
- IRISH HOME RULE. (See HOME RULE.)
- IRISH NATIONALISTS, 36, 70, 71, 72, 100, 270, 300, 310, 321.
- IRISH PARTY IN 1852...67.
- IRISH REBELLION, 1916...248, n., 374.
- IRISH ROMAN CATHOLICS, injurious effect of, on Scotland, 350, 351.
- IRISH UNIVERSITIES BILL, 1873...46.
- IRRESPONSIBLE ADVISERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA, 443, 444, 500.
- ISAACS, SIR RUFUS (later Marquis of Reading), in Cabinet, 56, 244.
- ISLE OF MAN, 212, 429.
- ISSUES, 313—320.
vital, decided by Ministry, 296, 297.
- ISVOLSKY, ALEXANDER, 450, 486, 491.
- ITALY. (See also ETHIOPIA.) 96, 136, 147, 218, 220, 269, 282, 283, 312, 313, 332, 469, 470, 475, 476, 488, 565. supports dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, 555, 556, 557.
surrender of Mr. Chamberlain to, 558, 559, 562.
treaty of April 16th, 1938, with, 269, 385, 494, 509, n., 553, 558.
- ITALY, KING OF, wrongfully recognised by George VI. as Emperor of Ethiopia, 494, 503, n., 553, 558.
- JACKSON, ADMIRAL, SIR J., supersession of, 100.
- JAMES, SIR HENRY (later Lord James of Hereford). advice to Queen Victoria (Askwith, pp. 231—234)...371, 372.
offered judicial office, 538.
- JAMES II., 15, 358.
- JAMESON RAID ON TRANSVAAL, Mr. J. Chamberlain's complicity in, 302, n.

- JAPAN, 279, 281, 304, 486, 487.
JAPAN, EMPEROR OF, given the Garter, 544.
JOHNSTONE, HON. ALAN, Minister at Copenhagen, 487.
JOHORE, receives Dindings, 282.
JOWITT, SIR WILLIAM, loses seat and office in 1931...50.
JOYNSON-HICKS, SIR W. (later Lord Brentford), 59, n., 113, n., 123, • 247, n., 319, n., 325, n., 357 n., 430, 431, 432.
JUBALAND, surrender of, to Italy, 282.
JUBILEE CELEBRATIONS, 1887, 1897, AND 1935...455.
JUBILEE HONOURS, 548.
JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS, Crown's relation to, 537—540.
JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL, appointments to, 538.
JUDICIAL INVESTIGATION OF POLITICAL ACTION, objections to, 13, 14.
JUNIOR LORDS OF TREASURY, 229, 230.
JUNIOR MINISTERS, obligation on, to respect Cabinet decisions, 124, 125.
JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, under Lord Chancellor, 207, 208.
- KASHGAR, British jurisdiction in, 219.
KEIR HARDIE, MR., Edward VII's. courtesy to, 489.
KELLY-KENNY, SIR T., advises Edward VII., 447, 517, 518.
KENT, DUKE OF, 445.
KENYA, annexation of, 282.
“ KHAKI ” ELECTION IN 1900...254.
KHILAFAT ISSUE IN INDIA, 106.
KIMBERLEY, EARL OF, Colonial Secretary, 61, 369.
KING, H.M., THE. (See Crown.)
KING OF ITALY, recognised as Emperor of Ethiopia, 509, 553, 558.
KING'S AND LORD TREASURER'S REMEMBRANCER, Edinburgh, 172.
KING'S PROCTOR, 231.

- KING'S REMEMBRANCER, 231.
- KING'S SPEECH, 389—391.
- KINGSLEY, CHARLES, Queen Victoria's interest in, 527.
- KITCHENER, F.M., LORD, 98, 137, 158, 163, 181, 426, 505, 506, 517, 535, 536.
- KNIGHTON, SIR W., Private Secretary to George IV., 441.
- KNOCK-OUT BLOW, policy of the, 123.
- KNOLLYS, LORD, 42, 403, 442.
- KNUTSFORD, LORD, on purchase of honours, 546.
- KOSSUTH, L., Hungarian leader, 103, 472, 473.
- KRUGER, PRESIDENT, South African Republic, 324, 426.
- KUWAIT, British jurisdiction in, 219.
- LABOUCHERE, HENRY,
 Privy Councillor, 543.
 refused office in 1892...61.
 seeks to abolish hereditary element in House of Lords, 465.
- LABOUR, MINISTRY OF, 49, 170, 189, 239.
- LABOUR AND THE NATION, 262.
- LABOUR AND THE NEW SOCIAL ORDER, 262.
- LABOUR GOVERNMENTS. (See MACDONALD.)
- LABOUR PARTY, 36, 71, 72, 85, 262, 264, 275, 276, 312, 314, 316, 317, 324, 328, 330, 333, 334, 335, 341, 433.
- LABOUR REPRESENTATION COMMITTEE, 262.
- LADIES OF THE BEDCHAMBER, incident of (1839), 64.
- LAMBETH PALACE, care of, 249.
- LAMBETH PALACE MEETING TO DISCUSS PARLIAMENT BILL, 373, 404.
- LAND REGISTRY OFFICE, 207.
- LAND VALUES REFERENCE COMMITTEE, 172.
- LANG, C. G.,
 Archbishop of Canterbury, 528, n.
 broadcast censure by, of Edward VIII., 367.

- LANG, J. T., Premier of New South Wales, 367.
- LANKESTER, RAY, K.C.B. for, 544.
- LANSBURY, EDGAR, fined, 10, 153.
- LANSBURY, GEORGE, M.P., 153, 154.
- LANSDOWNE, FOURTH MARQUESS OF, 37, 39, 53, 55, 57, 433.
- LANSDOWNE, FIFTH MARQUESS OF, 119, 158, 376, 402, 405, 438, 439, 447 n., 450, 485, 486, 487, 500, 518.
- LARNE, gun-running at (1914), 380, n.
- LASCELLES, SIR F., Ambassador at Berlin, 535.
- LAUSANNE, TREATY OF, Lord Curzon's negotiations for, 88.
- LAVAL, M., betrays Ethiopia, 82, 96, 106, 136, 282, 311, 384, 385, 422, 425.
- LAW AND CONVENTIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION, 5, 6.
- LAW OFFICERS,
England, 50, 56, 149, 244—246, 538.
Scotland, 50, 246.
- LAW REFORM (MARRIED WOMEN AND TORTFEASORS) ACT, 1935...209, n.
- LAW REVISION COMMITTEE, 209, n.
- LAYARD, SIR A. H., 60, 183, 534.
- LEADER OF OPPOSITION, position of, 326.
- LEADER OF PARTY, mode of selection of, 272—275.
- LEADERSHIP OF HOUSE OF COMMONS, now incumbent on Prime Minister, 87, 88.
- LEAGUE OF NATIONS, Under-Secretary at Foreign Office for affairs of, 217.
- LEAGUE OF NATIONS COVENANT,
Article 19...564.
Article 20...385, 509, n. violation of, 106, 268, 282, 283, 284, 312, 384, 385, 495, 509, n., 553, 558.
- LEAGUE OF YOUNG LIBERALS, 259, n., 260.
- LEAVES FROM A JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, 444.
- LECKY, W. E. H., Irish historian, 511.
- LEE, failure of attempt to execute, 429.

- LEE, SIR S., historian, 465.
legal basis of validity of constitutional conventions, 8, 9.
- LEGAL IMMUNITY OF MINISTERS, exceptions to, 238.
- LEGAL IMMUNITY OF TRADE UNIONS, 112.
- LEGISLATION. (See also Assent; Bills.) essential duty of Cabinet to promote, 3.
- LEIGHTON, SIR F., Lord, 542.
- LENNOX-BOYD, A. T., indiscretion of, 125.
- LEOPOLD, H.R.H., PRINCE, annuity for, 124.
bad advice of, 444, 445.
- LEOPOLD I., King of the Belgians, 468, 469, 513, 523.
- LEOPOLD II., King of the Belgians, 486.
- LEOPOLD OF HOHENZOLLERN, candidate for Spanish throne, 477.
- LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO CROWN, reporting Cabinet decisions, 411.
reporting Parliamentary debates, 411.
- LETTERS, &c., opening of, in post office, 214.
- LETTERS PATENT, uses of, 204, 205, 212, 453.
- LEWIS, SIR GEORGE C., 56.
- LIBERAL LEAGUE, 272, n.
- LIBERAL NATIONAL PARTY, 36, 58, 73, 130, 260, 271, 298.
- LIBERAL PARTY, 36, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 78, 85, 121, 243, 257, 260, 268, 270, 271, 272, 276, 300, 310, 314, 316, 324, 328, 333, 334, 335, 336, 366.
reconstituted, 259.
- LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION, 1936...259.
- LIBERAL UNIONISTS, 36, 70, 71, 129, 270, 325, 341.
- LIBERTY, British determination to crush Arab, in Palestine, 558.
- LIDDON, CANON, 527.
- LIGHTFOOT, CANON, 526.
- LIMITATION OF POWERS OF CABINET, arguments for, 332—335.
devolution, 349—355.
Parliamentary committees, 346—349.
proportional representation, 335—341.
referendum, 341—346.

- LIQUOR, royal abstinence from, during Great War, 521.
- LITHUANIA, Polish ultimatum to, 218.
- LITVINOFF, M., keeps faith with Czechoslovakia, 557.
- LIVERPOOL, EARL OF, 28, 29, 65.
- LLOYD, LORD, 182, 185, n.
- LLOYD GEORGE, D., against war, 93.
appeals to people, 84, 254.
as Chancellor of Exchequer, 59, 195.
as Minister of Munitions, 97.
as Prime Minister, 32, 36, 72, 79, 80.
asks A. Chamberlain to be Chancellor outside Cabinet, 161.
attitude of, in 1916...57, 94, 138, 158, 159, 433, 434.
coalition aimed at in 1910 by, 325.
commits Cabinet, 112. complaint of Cabinet ignorance, 114, 115.
coupon election arranged by, 130.
ignores collective responsibility, 122, 123.
inner ring in Cabinet approved by, 138.
issues electoral manifesto, 320.
not persona grata to Edward VII., 418, 421.
party fund of, 259, 260, 274, 275, 547.
Press used by, 276.
retires without an honour, 548.
Shadow Cabinet, 325.
uses Cabinet information in Memoirs, 153, 154.
views of—
 on dispute between Lord Curzon and E. Montagu, 106, 107.
 on foreign policy, 94, 95.
 on war policy, 99, 130, 165, 181, 182.
- LOCAL GOVERNMENT, limits of ministerial responsibility for, 170.
- LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD, 189, 239, 240.
- LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1888...349.
- LOCAL LABOUR PARTIES, 263.
- LOCAL POLITICAL ASSOCIATIONS, 257, 258.
- LOCAL REGISTRATION SOCIETIES, 257.
- LOCARNO PACT, 1925...282.
- LOCARNO TREATY, 1925, France and Czechoslovakia, 553.
- LOCKE KING, P. J., motion on franchise in 1851...45.
- LOFTUS, LORD A., recall of, 534.
- LONDON CONFERENCE ON NAVAL LIMITATION, 1930...494.
1935—1936...494.

- LONDON DOCK STRIKE, 1926...214, n.
- LONDON GAZETTE*, OFFICE, 172, 231.
- LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT ACT, 1933...238.
- LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD, 169, 238.
- LONG, WALTER, VISCOUNT, 64, n., 273, 433, n.
- LORD ADVOCATE, 50, 246, 539.
- LORD CHAMBERLAIN, 204.
- LORD CHANCELLOR, 50, 148, 204, n., 206—209, 453, 538.
- LORD GREAT CHAMBERLAIN, 171.
- LORD HIGH TREASURER, 229.
- LORD LIEUTENANTS,
recommend appointment of justices of peace, 207.
Territorial army, interest in, 519.
- LORD LYON, Court of, in Scotland, mischievous activities of, 171.
- LORD MAYOR OF LONDON, attends royal accession, 203.
is notified of royal incidents, 212.
- LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL, 49, 51, 54, 55, 65, 139, 144, 204, n., 206, 451.
- LORD PRIVY SEAL, 49, 51, 55, 65, 209, 565.
- LORDS. (See also HOUSE OF LORDS.)
- LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF THE ADMIRALTY, 189, 206, 227, 228.
- LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF THE TREASURY, 65, 216, 229, 452, 453.
- LOREBURN, LORD, 57, 92, 546.
- LORNE, MARQUIS OF, 496, n.
- LOUGHBOROUGH, EARL OF, excluded in 1801 from Cabinet, 27.
- LOUIS OF BATTENBERG, PRINCE, 99.
- LOUIS PHILIPPE, King of the French, 468, 469, 470.
- LOUISE, PRINCESS, daughter of Queen Victoria, dowry for, 460, n.
- LOWE, R., Lord Sherbrooke, 60, 104, 106, 301.
- LUMLEY, SIR ROGER, 185, n.
- LYNCH, A., reprieve of, 429.

LYNDHURST, LORD, refuses office, 401.

LYONS, J. A., Prime Minister of Commonwealth of Australia, 8, 345.

LYTTELTON, ALFRED, 549.

MACAULAY, T. B., LORD,
on virtual representation, 22.
votes for Maynooth grant, 291, n.

MACDONALD, SIR JOHN, Premier of Canada, position of, in Pacific Railway scandal, 369, 370.

MACDONALD, MURRAY, 353, n.

MACDONALD, RAMSAY,
appeals to people, 254, 255.
as Prime Minister, 81, 82.
betrays party, 86.
declines an honour, 548.
denounces Czar of Russia, 489.
dissolution of, in 1924...7, 298.
elected party leader, 275.
endeavours to create workers' and soldiers' councils, 252.
Lord President of Council, 144.
position of—
 in 1931...43, 44, 82, 154, 435, 461.
 in 1935...50, 55.
 in 1936...267, n.
Prime Minister—
 in 1924...36, 58, 175, 395.
 in 1929—1931...36, 58, 73, 144, 177, 323.
 in 1931—1935...31, 34, 36, 73, 121, 122.
reduces number of political posts in household, 62, n.
resignation of—
 in 1924...297, 298, 300.
 in 1937...105.
views of, on foreign affairs, 95.
violent language of, 489.

MACDONNELL, SIR A., LORD, 511.

MACEDONIAN REVOLT, 485.

MACHINERY OF GOVERNMENT COMMITTEE, 110, 162.

MACKENZIE KING, W. L., Premier of Canada, refused a dissolution by Lord Byng, 379, 396.

MACKENNA, REGINALD, 105, 155.

MACLEAN, D. NORMAN, adviser of Queen Victoria, 529.

McNEILL, R., assaults Mr. Churchill, 322.

MAHAN, ADMIRAL, 537.

- MAHDI, question of attack on, 497, 498.
- MALAYAN INFORMATION AGENCY, 222.
- MALET, SIR E., selected for Berlin Embassy, 534, n.
- MANDATE,
doctrine of the, 304—313, 328, 385, 494, 495.
ignored in 1938...563, 564.
- MANDATED TERRITORIES, 222.
German claim on, 558.
- MANHOOD SUFFRAGE, 258.
- MANIPUR, murders at, 449, 499, 500.
- MANSFIELD, LORD,
on Parliamentary representation, 22.
on responsibility of Ministers, 26, 27.
- MARCONI SCANDAL, 14, 187, 188.
- MARIA, QUEEN OF PORTUGAL, 469.
- MARJORIBANKS, E., LORD TWEEDMOUTH, 55, 105, 266.
Kaiser's letter to, 490.
- MARKET SUPPLY COMMITTEE, 237.
- MARKETING BOARDS, 236, 237.
- MARLBOROUGH, DUKE OF, Minister of Queen Anne, 16.
- MARLEY, LORD, 362.
- MARRIAGE OF KING, 366—368.
- MARRIAGE OF MEMBERS OF ROYAL FAMILY, 204.
- MARTIN, SIR THEODORE, 479.
- MARY, PRINCESS, COUNTESS OF HAREWOOD, 204.
- MASEFIELD, J. E., Poet Laureate, 537.
- MASKAT, British jurisdiction in, 219.
- MASON, E. D., M.P., 266.
- MASS HYSTERIA IN HOUSE OF COMMONS, September, 28, 19: 561.
- MASTER-GENERAL OF THE ORDNANCE, 225.
- MATTERS NOT USUALLY DISCUSSED IN CABINET, 115—12
exceptional cases, 533, 534.
- MATTHEWS, H., Home Secretary, 61, 104, 430.

- MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1937...267.
- MAUD, PRINCESS, daughter of Edward VII., 487.
- MAUGHAM, LORD, treats Covenant of League of Nations as invalid, 558, 559.
- MAURICE, SIR FREDERICK, MAJ.-GEN., makes charges against Mr. Lloyd George, 14, 166.
- MAYBRICK, MRS., reprieve of, 428, 429.
- MAYNOOTH, Roman Catholic College at, 291, n., 523.
- MAYOR OF CORK, case of, 429.
- MAX MÜLLER, F., P.C., 542.
- MEDALS, grant of, by Crown, 549.
- MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL, 205.
- MEDIATION BY CROWN BETWEEN PARTY LEADERS, 435—441.
- MEDITERRANEAN,
arrangements with France as to naval force in, 92.
control of the, 197, 332.
- MEHEMET ALI, in Egypt, 468.
- MEIGHEN, A., given dissolution by Lord Byng, 379, 395.
- MEIN KAMPF, circulated in Czechoslovakia, 556.
- MELBOURNE, LORD,
as Prime Minister, 1835—1841...66, 76.
corresponds with Queen after resignation, 432. defeated, 296.
dissolves in 1841...289, 297, 357.
position of—
in 1834...64, 65, 361, 362, 363, 369.
in 1839...66, 357.
Press used by, 275.
Queen's speech composed by, 389.
resignation of, in 1841...23.
right of Crown to criticise, admitted by, 59.
statement on resignation by Minister requires his consent, 151, 152.
unanimity of Cabinet insisted on by, 29, 120, 151.
- MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS, party control over, 265—269.
- MERCY, prerogative of, 116, 117, 213.
- MESOPOTAMIA FIASCO, leads to Mr. Chamberlain's resignation, 106, 248, n.
Royal Commission, 505.
- METEOROLOGICAL OFFICE, 172, 227.

- METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE, 212.
- METTERNICH, COUNT, 483.
- MIDDLETON, EARL OF, 505, n.
- MIDLOTHIAN CAMPAIGN, 84.
- "MIDSUMMER MADNESS," foolish phrase of Mr. N. Chamberlain, 123.
- MIKADO*, temporary ban on performance of, 544.
- MILITARY CONVERSATIONS WITH FRENCH OFFICERS, from 1905...91—93.
- MILITARY OFFICERS, disloyalty to their chiefs, 179—181.
- MILK MARKETING BOARD, 236.
- MILNER, VISCOUNT, 380.
acts so as to force war in South Africa, 137, 517.
censured by House of Commons, 503.
proposes special clasp, 549, n.
- MINES, MINISTRY OF, 97, 98, 162, 235.
- MINISTER OF JUSTICE, 209.
- MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF CROWN, 120—128, 356—391.
insisted on, by Edward VII., 488, 503, 506.
- MINISTERS OF THE CROWN,
acquire experience in House of Commons, 173, 174, 175.
Civil Service relations with, 172—179.
coalitions, 36, 57, 99, 128, 129, 130, 157, 158, 159.
extent and character of responsibility, 167, 450—454.
formation of Ministry, 48—62.
functions of, 172—178.
military officers, relations with, 180—182.
obligations of, as regards private interests, 185—188.
position of, in House of Lords, 51—53.
preferably professional politicians, 163.
relations of, to Prime Minister, 90—108.
removal of, 101—108.
resignation of, 105, 106, 107, 108, 126, 127, 301, 302, 454, n.
solidarity of, 16, n.
statements by, on resignation, 151, 152.
unanimity of, in speeches, 122, 123, 125.
withholding of information from, 114, 115.
without portfolio, 53, 54.
- MINISTERS OF THE CROWN ACT, 1937...2, 49—51, 109, 194, 230.
- MINISTRIES,
Agriculture and Fisheries, 49, 189, 236, 237.
Co-ordination of Defence, 49, 54, 142—144, 145, 190, 228, 229.
Food, 162, n.

MINISTRIES—continued.

Health, 49, 189, 191, 239—241.
Labour, 49, 170, 189, 239.
Mines, 97, 98, 162.
Munitions, 157.
National Service, 162, n.
Pensions, 49, 241.
Shipping, 162, n.
Transport, 49, 189, 237, 238.

MINOR MINISTRIES, 243—246.MINORITY GOVERNMENTS, 37, 38, 43, 338—340.*MINT, THE ROYAL, 172, 231.*MINTO, FOURTH EARL OF, mission to Italy of, 469.*MINTO, FIFTH EARL OF, Governor-General of India, 506.*MINUTES OF CABINET, 154.*MODENA, DUCHY OF, 475.*MODERATION, as essential in political system, 12, 13.*MODERATION OF LANGUAGE URGED BY EDWARD VII., 417, 418.*MOLESWORTH, SIR WILLIAM, 56, 57.*MONRO, MR., Commissioner of Police, 430.*MONSELL, MR., resignation of, 104.*MONSELL, LORD, First Lord of the Admiralty, 105.*MONTAGU, EDWIN, Secretary of State for India, 106, 107, 152, 302.*MONTAGU-CHELMSFORD REFORMS, 223, 427.*MORANT, SIR ROBERT, Permanent Secretary, Board of Education, 178.*MORGANATIC MARRIAGE OF EDWARD VIII., negatived, 367.*MORIER, SIR ROBERT, diplomatic career of, 480, 534, 535.*MORLEY, JOHN, VISCOUNT, 55, 57, 59, n., 82, 93, 120, 309, 318, 345, 395, 406, 426, 505, 506, 520, 535, 537.*MORLEY-MINTO REFORMS, 426.*MORNING POST, political influence of, 275, 276.*MOROCCO, issues affecting, 483, 487.*MORRISON, HERBERT, 252.

refuses to join National Government, 31.

MOVEMENT OF TROOPS,

Cabinet control of, 285.

Parliamentary questions on, 304.

MUNICH, British and French betrayal of Czechoslovakia at, 555—558.

MUNITIONS COMMITTEE AND MINISTRY IN GREAT WAR, 97, 157.

MURDER GANG, Mr. Lloyd George's surrender to, 311.

MUSSOLINI, BENITO, forces Mr. Chamberlain to conclude agreements, 153, 218, 269, 487, 555, 557.

MUTINY,

in army at the Curragh (1914), 253, 380—383.

in navy at Invergordon, 253, 383.

NAPOLEON, LOUIS, approval of coup d'état by Lord Palmerston, 103, 473, 475.

NATHAN, SIR M., resignation of, 248, n.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF LABOUR, 265, 332.

NATIONAL DEBT OFFICE, 232.

NATIONAL DEFENCE CONTRIBUTION SCHEME, 286.

NATIONAL GALLERY, 172, 231.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT, 1931...13, 31, 36, 37, 38, 324, 363, 366.
true National Government proposed by Mr. Eden, 565.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE JOINT COMMITTEE, 216, 240.

NATIONAL HOME FOR THE JEWS, 176, 557, 558.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE, 1919...354.

NATIONAL LABOUR PARTY, 36, 58, 73, 130, 271, 336.

NATIONAL LIBERALS, 333, 334.

NATIONAL LIBERAL FEDERATION, 257, 258.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL LABORATORY, 206.

NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY, 172, 231.

NATIONAL SERVICE, Ministry of, 162, n.

NATIONAL UNION OF CONSERVATIVE AND CONSTITUTIONAL (UNIONIST) SOCIETIES, 260, 261, 270.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEERS, 374.

NATIONALISTS IN IRELAND, 376.

- NATIVE TERRITORIES, South African, 220, 221, 503.
NATIONALS, in 1935 election, 73.
NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, 544.
NAURU, mandated territory, 222.
NAUTICAL ALMANAC OFFICE, 228.
NAVAL BASE ON FORTH, 428, n.
NAVY BOARD, 227.
NE EXEAT REGNO, writ of, 214.
NEPAL, Prime Minister of, 507.
NEUTRALITY, Dominion right to, 509
NEW GUINEA, mandated territory, 222.
NEW MINISTRIES AND SECRETARIES ACT, 1916...239.
NEW SOUTH WALES, 341, 399, 400.
NEW ZEALAND,
 does not approve Italian agreement, 566.
 duration of Parliament, 331.
 form of treaties for, 453.
NEWCASTLE, DUKE OF, resigns, 18.
NEWCASTLE PROGRAMME, 1891...258.
NEWFOUNDLAND, 220.
 Governor of, sits in Council with ministers, 521.
NEWS LETTER, THE, 186.
NICHOLAS II., Czar of Russia, 468.
NIGHTINGALE, MISS FLORENCE, 512.
NIVELLE, GENERAL, 164, 165.
NO-CONFIDENCE, vote of, decisive character of, 297, 298.
NOLLE PROSEQUI, 245.
NON-INTERVENTION IN SPANISH WAR, farcical policy of, 283, 284, 558.
NORMANBY, LORD, Ambassador at Paris, 183, 473.
NORTH, LORD, Prime Minister, 1770—1782...19, 304, 305, 356.
NORTH BRITON, 389.

NORTHBROOK, LORD, 52.

NORTHCOTE, EARL OF, 38, 88, 437.

NORTHERN IRELAND. (See also ULSTER.) danger to constitution of, 281.

Home Secretary's relations to, 212.
proportional representation in, 336.
relations of Imperial Parliament to, 353.
royal opening of first Parliament, 440, 512.

NORTHERN WAR FROM 1714, Britain's neutrality in, 358.

NORWAY,

constitutional change in, 331.
proportional representation in, 335.
separated from Sweden, 487.

NURSES' REGISTRATION COUNCIL, 240.

OATH, Privy Councillor's, 203, n.

OATHS OF OFFICE, taken in Council, 203.

OBSTRUCTION IN PARLIAMENT, 321.

O'CONNELL, D., agitation by, 22.

OFFICE OF WORKS, 243, 244.

OFFICERS IN AIR FORCE AND ARMY,
commissions of, 452.
purchase of, in army, 513.

OFFICERS OF HOUSEHOLD, 52, 171.

OFFICES OF HOUSES OF LORDS AND COMMONS, 249, 250.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACTS, 1911 and 1920...10, 153.

OLD AGE PENSIONS, denied by Treasury, 200, n.

OLD SARUM, rotten borough, 21.

OPEN QUESTIONS IN CABINET, 120, 121.

OPPOSITION IN PARLIAMENT,

acts as unit, 29.
determination of policy of, 113.
duty of, to take office, 37, 38, 44—48, 306, 307, 315.
party leader, 326.
relations of,
 to Cabinet, 321—326.
 to Crown, 431—441.

ORCHARDSON, W. Q., honour for, 543.

ORDER OF MERIT, 540, 544.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL,

as regards civil service, 202.

forms and purposes of, 203, 204, 205, 451.

proposal to effect socialisation by, 385.

used to defeat resistance of House of Lords, 206.

ORDNANCE BOARD, 224.

ORDNANCE SURVEY, 236.

OSBORNE, BERNAL, 60.

OTTAWA, selected by Queen Victoria as capital of Canada, 496.

OTTAWA CONFERENCE, 1932...73, 121, 234.

OVERSEA SETTLEMENT BOARD, 221.

OVERSEAS MECHANICAL TRANSPORT COUNCIL, 221.

OVERSEAS TRADE DEPARTMENT, 218, 234, 235.

OXFORD, EARL OF, dismissed (1714), 25, 26.

OXFORD AND ASQUITH, EARL OF. (See Asquith.)

PACIFIC RAILWAY SCANDALS IN CANADA, 369, 370.

PACIFICO, DON, Palmerton's action in case of, 102, 327.

PAGET, SIR A., foolish action of (1914), 380.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER, 244.

PALMERSTON, LORD,

appeals to people, 84.

arrangements as to army made by, 512, 513.

consults Cabinet on its membership, 56.

dissolves Parliament in 1857...36.

ecclesiastical appointments made by, 525, 526.

Foreign Secretary, 58, 68.

position of—

in 1851...101, 424, 472—474.

in 1852...36, 45, 67, 104.

in 1858...36, 45, 68, 251.

Press used by, 276.

Prime Minister—

in 1855—1858...38, 67, 68.

in 1859—1865...34.

relations of, to Lord J. Russell, 90, 102, 103, 424, 470, 471, 472, 474.

PANMURE, LORD, Secretary of State for War, 98, n.

PAPER DUTIES BILL, 1860...76.

PARDON, prerogative of, 428, 429, 456.
not usually discussed in Cabinet, 116, 117.

PARIS PACT, 1928...563.

PARLIAMENT. (See also DISSOLUTION; HOUSE OF COMMONS; HOUSE OF LORDS.)

alteration of position of Commons and Cabinet, 251—256.
Cabinet control over, 256—278.
extent and character of Cabinet control, 278—287.
 dissolution, 287—304.
 mandate, 304—313.
formulation of issues, 313—320.
leaders in opposition, relations with Cabinet, 320—326.
limitation of Cabinet authority, proposals to effect, 332—335.
 devolution, 349—355.
 proportional representation, 335—341.
referendum, 341—346.
 use of Parliamentary committees, 346—349.
not consulted prior to action in regard to Czechoslovakia, 555, 561, 562.
surrender of sovereignty over Sudan not communicated to, 219.

PARLIAMENT BILL, 1910, AND ACT, 1911, controversy over, 3, 4, 33, 71, 309, 310, 324, 327, 328, 372, 373, 376, 403—407, 439.

PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATE SOCIETY, 256.

PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATES,

electoral expenses of, 259, 260, 261.
mode of selection of, 259, 260, 261, 264, 265.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES OF INQUIRY, 302, 303.

PARLIAMENTARY COUNSEL'S OFFICE, 172, 231.

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVATE SECRETARIES, 240.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION, 20—23.
 inequalities of, 332—335.

PARLIAMENTARY SALARIES, increase of, accentuates Prime Minister's control, 268, n.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY,

Admiralty, 227, 241.
Board of Education, 241.
Board of Trade, 234.
Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, 236.
Ministry of Health, 239.
Ministry of Labour, 239.
Ministry of Transport, 237.
Treasury, 49, 148, 149, 230.

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE, 49, 50, 53, 59, 174, 246—248.

- Air Ministry, 226.
- Burma Office, 224.
- Colonial Office, 222.
- Dominions Office, 220.
- Foreign Office, 143, 144, 217.
- Home Office, 215.
- India Office, 224.
- Scottish Office, 216.
- War Office, 225.

PARNELL, C. S., 100, 101, 112, 253.

PARNELL COMMISSION, 13.

PARTY CONTROL OVER MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, 265—269.

PARTY FUNDS,

- Conservative, 261.
- Labour, 265.
- Liberal, 259, 260.

PARTY LEADERSHIP, 272, 273.

PARTY MEETINGS TO SELECT LEADER, 273, 274.

PASSCHENDAELE OPERATIONS, 1917. .115.

PASSFIELD, LORD, 435, 461.

PATENT OFFICE, 235.

- Patents Appeal Tribunal, 172.

PATHOLOGICAL LABORATORY, 240.

PATRONAGE. (See also APPOINTMENTS.)

- former political importance of, 17.

PATRONAGE SECRETARY, 545.

PAYMASTER-GENERAL, office of, 172, 231.

PEACE BALLOT, 1935...295, 563.

PEACE BILL, 1935...419.

PEACE WITH HONOUR,

- brought back by Lord Beaconsfield in 1878...294, 562.
- contrasted with Mr. Chamberlain's claim in 1938...563.

PEEL, GENERAL JONATHAN, 417.

PEEL, SIR ROBERT,

- ability of, as Prime Minister, 75, 76.
- appeals to people, 84, 313.
- approves Catholic emancipation, 20, 22.
- betrays party, 325.

PEEL, SIR ROBERT—continued.

disapproves advice from Lord Melbourne after resignation, 432.
 election manifesto of, 305, 306, 319, 320.
 party organisation by, 257.
 position of, in 1839...64, 66.
 Prime Minister—
 in 1834...31, 64, 65, 66, 109.
 in 1841—1846...35, 66.
 refuses office in 1832...401.
 resignation of—
 in 1835...23.
 in 1846...297.
 responsibility for termination of Lord Melbourne's government accepted by, 63, 361, 362, 363, 369.
 splits Conservative party, 86.
 views of—
 on by-elections, 288.
 on Church of Scotland, 529.
 on issues, 313.
 on Ministerial qualifications, 175.
 on nature of dissolution, 293, 294, 393
 on Roman Catholic Church, 523.
 on Treasury control, 191.
 on unanimity of opposition, 29.
 on virtual representation, 22.

PEELITES, 35, 37, 38, 56, 66, 67, 276.PEER,

Prime Minister not now a, 7, 31, 32. question of Ministries to be held by, 51—53, 565.

PEERS,

creation of, to override Upper House, 372, 373, 386, 390—407, 466.
 Prime Minister recommends, to Crown, 540, 541.
 special remainders not liked by Edward VII., 544, n.

PELHAMS, THE, authority over George II. of, 359.PENJDEH, Afghan defeat at, 497, 500.PENSIONS, Ministry of, 49, 241.

 for workers at age 65...317.

PENSIONS APPEAL TRIBUNALS, 207, 241.PEOPLE, capacity to judge men or policy, 255, 256.PERCEVAL, SPENCER, on Ministerial responsibility, 360.PERCIVAL, DR., becomes Bishop of Hereford, 527.PERCY, LORD EUSTACE, minister without portfolio, 54.PERMANENT CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL STATISTICS, 191.

PERMANENT SECRETARY,
Admiralty, 227.
Treasury, 144, 201, 230.

PERMANENT UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE,
Colonial Office, 224.
Dominions Office, 224.
Foreign Office, 143, 144, 217, 559.
Home Office, 215, 243, n.

PERSIA, 484, 489.
Shah of, Garter for, 544, 551.

PERSONALITIES, general elections fought on, 83—86.

PÉTAIN, GENERAL, 156.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT, 212, 245.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT ACT, 1860...212.

PETROL TAX WITHDRAWN BY MR. CHURCHILL, 286.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY, 205.

PHIPPS, COL., informs Queen of Lord Palmerston's actions, 473.

PHYSICAL TRAINING AND RECREATION ACT, 1937...317.

PIRRIE, LORD, controversy over peerage of, 543.

PITT, W., 19, 22, 28, 305, 357, 359, 360, 439, 544.

PITT, W., Earl of Chatham, 18, 382.

PLURAL VOTING BILL, 1906...308.

POINCARÉ, RAYMOND, 493.

POLAND, imposes will—
on Czechoslovakia, 556, 562.
on Lithuania, 218.
rebellion in, 476.

POLICE FORCES, Home Secretary's control over, 212, 213.

POLICE MAGISTRATES IN METROPOLIS, 213, 452.

POLICE STRIKE OF 1918...248, n., 430.

POLITICAL MOTIVES,
for Civil Service appointments, 184, 185.
for diplomatic service changes, 183, 184.
for Governors' selection, 182, 183.

POLITICAL PARTIES, 1, 21, 22, 256—278. relation of, to Prime Minister, 86.

- PONSONBY, LADY, 463.
- PONSONBY, LORD, Ambassador at Vienna, 471
- PONSONBY, OF SHULBREDE, LORD, 449.
- PONSONBY, SIR HENRY, 39, 40, 41, 42, 437.
- POOR LAW BOARD, 239.
- POPE, H. H. THE, Crown's relations with, 469, 484, 530, 531, 532.
- POPULAR FRONT,
in France, 263.
proposed for England, 264, n.
- PORT ARTHUR, Russian acquisition of, 479.
- PORTLAND, DUKE OF, 19.
Prime Minister, 20, 294, 360, 393.
- PORTUGAL, 469, 551.
King of, given Garter, 551.
- PORTUGUESE COLONIAL EMPIRE IN AFRICA, future of, 284.
renewal of British guarantee of territories of, in 1938 .566.
treaties affecting, 479, 480.
- POST OFFICE AND POSTMASTER-GENERAL, 232—234.
- POST OFFICE BOARD, 232.
- POSTMASTER-GENERAL, 49, 53, 65, 176, 192, 194, 232—234.
- POYNTER, SIR J. D., Lord Islington, 535.
- PRAYER BOOK REVISION, 121, n., 125, 532.
- PRECEDENCE OF PRIME MINISTER, 87.
- PRECEDENTS, authority of, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 39.
- PREFERENTIAL TRADE, 342.
- PREROGATIVE OF CROWN, 167, 189. (See also Assent: Peers.)
Bills affecting, need prior sanction, 419.
exercised through Home Office, 211, 212.
in colonial affairs, 222.
in foreign affairs, 218.
in honours, 540—552.
in pardon, 428, 429, 456.
in respect of—cession of territory, 281, 282.
 dismissal of ministers, 368—391.
 dissolution of Parliament, 391—399.
 selection of—ministers, 360.
 Prime Minister, 30—48.

PRESIDENT OF EIRE, 533, n.

PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION, 49, 162, n., 241.

PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE, 49, 55, 150, 234.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION IN UNITED STATES, 295.

PRESS,

influence of, in politics, 273—275, 379, 565.
royal appeals to, to adopt policy, 479, 483.

PRESS-LORDS, 379.

PREVENTION OF CORRUPTION ACT, 1906...245.

PRIME MINISTER,

advises on choice of successor, 42, 365, 433, 434.
agenda of Cabinet decided by, 130—139.
available for consultation by Crown, 423.
appointments made by, 533.
chosen by Crown, 30—48, 356—361. development of office of, 16—19.
forms Cabinet, 48—62.
functions of, 86—101.
party leader, 272, 273, 275.
power of—

to dismiss ministers, 101—108.
to dissolve Parliament, 396—399, 560. — recommends for honours, 540, 541, 547.

relations of—

to Cabinet, 109—120.
to Civil Service, 201.
to Committee of Imperial Defence, 139—147.

resignation of, dissolved ministry, 63, 64.

special concern with foreign affairs, 218, 494, 495, 559—566.

status of, 75—86.

PRINCE OF WALES, Edward VII., 445, 460, 478, 504, 510, 511, 515, 527, 552, n.

has no inherent authority to exercise powers, 515.

PRINCIPAL SUPPLY OFFICERS COMMITTEE, 143, 146.

PRISONS COMMISSION, 213.

PRITT, D. N., K.C., attacks N. Chamberlain, 564, n.

PRIVATE MEMBER'S BILL, ministerial voting on, 125.

prospect of passing, 267.

PRIVATE SECRETARIES. (See PARLIAMENTARY PRIVATE SECRETARIES.)

PRIVATE SECRETARIES TO CROWN, 441—443.

PRIVATE SECRETARY TO THE PRIME MINISTER, 131.

PRIVY COUNCIL. (See COUNCIL, PRIVY.)

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE, 239, 240.

PRIVY COUNCILLOR,

alleged individual right to advise Crown, 431, 432.

colonial premiers as, 496.

honour deemed inappropriate for Mr. Watts, 542.

PRIVY SEAL, 209, 454.

PROCURATOR-GENERAL AND TREASURY SOLICITOR. 231.

PROPERTY RIGHTS, respect for, 286.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION, 335—341.

PROPOSALS OF GOVERNMENT, how far to be notified to Crown, 371, 418—424.

PROTECTION, adopted as policy in 1931...121, 122, 234, 236.

PROTESTANT ALLIANCE, 531.

PROTESTANTISM, Queen Victoria's adherence to, 526, 529.

PROVISIONAL COLLECTION OF TAXES ACT, 1913...408.

PRUSSIA, 477.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE, 170, 171, 196, 197, 199, 200, 201, 202, 218.

PUBLIC ORDER ACT, 1936...245.

PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS. (See DIRECTOR.)

PUBLIC TRUSTEE, office of the, 207.

PUBLIC WORKS LOAN COMMISSION, 232.

PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT, 1874...524.

PUBLICATION DEPARTMENTS OF POLITICAL PARTIES, 277.

PUISNE JUDGES, appointed by Lord Chancellor, 207.

PUNCH, caricatures in, 479.

PUSEYITES, 523, 524.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL, 225.

QUEBEC, 331.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY, 171.

- QUEEN-REGENT OF SPAIN, 450, 479.
QUEENSLAND, second chamber in, 331, 400.
QUESTIONS IN PARLIAMENT, on defence issues and other matters, refusal of replies to, 303, 304.
QUINTON, MR., murder of, in Manipur, 499, 500.
- RACECOURSE BETTING CONTROL BOARD, 215.
RADETZKY, MARSHAL, atrocities of, in Milan, 470.
RADICALS, 67, 78, 276.
RAGLAN, LORD, in Crimea, 98.
RAILWAY AND CANAL COMMISSION, 172.
RAILWAY ASSESSMENT AUTHORITY, 172.
RAILWAY RATES TRIBUNAL, 238.
RAILWAY TRAVEL, Queen Victoria's desire for security of, 423.
RAILWAYS, control of, 237, 238.
RANKEILLOUR, LORD, seeks to alter Parliament Act, 330.
RATES ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 238.
RAYNER, reprieve of, 429.
READING, MARQUIS OF, Viceroy of India, 507.
RE-ARMAMENT, failure of National Government to carry out, 348.
REBELLION IN IRELAND, 1916...248, n., 374.
RECORD OFFICE, 172.
REDISTRIBUTION OF SEATS, 69, 72, 73.
royal mediation in regard to (1884), 307, 437.
REDMOND, W., 539.
RE-ELECTION ON TAKING OFFICE, formerly requisite, 87.
REFERENDUM, 341—346.
REGENCY BILL (later Act), 1937...149.
REGIONAL DEVOLUTION, 349—354.
REGISTRATION COUNCIL FOR TEACHERS, 242.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS, introduction of, fosters party organisation, 256.

REGISTRATION SOCIETIES, 256, 257.

REMOVAL OF MINISTERS BY CROWN, 101—108.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1832...9, 212, 213, 214, 219, 256, 265, 287, 304, 307, 313, 327, 364, 400.
1867...68, 69, 307, 323, 364.
1884...69, 253, 437.
1918...72, 253, 262, 309, 336, 467.
1928...73, 112, 120, 121, 253, 311, 467.

REPUBLICANISM IN BRITAIN, 459—461.

RESIGNATION OF PRIME MINISTER,
time for, 297—301.

1830...65.
1834 (Lord Grey), 65.
1834 (Lord Melbourne), 65.
1835...66.
1839...64, 66.
1841...66.
1845...64, 66.
1846...66.
1851...37, 39, 45, 46, 51, 64, 67, 297.
1852...67.
1855...37, 38, 39, 45, 64.
1858...68, 297.
1859...68, 297.
1866...69, 297, 299.
1873...69, 298.
1874...69, 298, 299.
1880...69, 300.
1885...69, 297.
1886 (Salisbury), 70.
1886 (Gladstone), 70, 297, 300.
1892...70, 300.
1894...70.
1895...70, 298.
1902...71.
1905...71.
1908...71.
1916...71.
1922...72.
1923...72.
1924...72, 297, 298.
1924 (MacDonald), 72, 297, 298.
1929...72.
1931...73.
1935...73.
1937...73.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CONDUCT OF WAR, 162—166, 516.

RESTORATION OF ORDER IN IRELAND (INDEMNITY) ACT 1923...5, 245.

- REVAL, Edward VII.'s visit to, 489, 551.
- REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 172, 192, 231.
- RHODES, CECIL, 173, n., 258, n.
- RIBBENTROP, HERR VON, 89.
- RICHMOND, DUKE OF, influenced by Queen, 437.
- RIPON, FIRST MARQUIS OF, 47, 52, 61, 91, 531.
- RITCHIE, C. T. (later Lord), 131.
- RITUAL PRACTICES, Queen Victoria's dislike of, 524.
- ROAD AND RAIL TRAFFIC ACT, 1933...238.
- ROAD AND RAIL TRAFFIC APPEAL TRIBUNAL, 172.
- ROAD TRAFFIC ACTS, 1930 and 1934 ..238.
- ROADS, control of, 237, 238.
- ROADS ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 238.
- ROBERTS, EARL, 181, 447, n., 514, 515, 516, 519.
- ROBERTSON, F.M. SIR WILLIAM, chief of the General Staff, 80, 99, 161, 163, 164, 165, 522.
- ROBINSON, SIR HERCULES, appointment of, to South Africa, 118.
- ROBINSON, SIR J. B., proposed peerage for, 546.
- ROCHESTER, LORD, on ministerial responsibility, 359.
- ROCKINGHAM, MARQUIS OF, Prime Minister, 27, 257.
- ROCKINGHAM WHIGS, 19.
- ROCKLEY, LORD, advocates life peerages, 330.
- RODD, SIR R., 535.
- ROEBUCK, J. A., motion for Crimean enquiry by, 37, 38, 45, 46, 47, 108, 127, 302, 474.
- ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH,
Crown's relations with, 530—532.
emancipation of, 20, 24, 28, 29, 502, 523, 529.
- ROMAN CATHOLIC HIERARCHY, titles assumed by, 112, 523, 532.
- ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF ACT, 1926...531, n.
- ROMANISM, Queen Victoria's opposition to, 523, 524, 526.
- ROMILLY, SIR SAMUEL, on ministerial responsibility, 360.

- ROSEBERY, EARL OF,
accepts office in 1892...41, 58, 61, 62, 91.
alleged refusal to call Cabinet, 114.
criticises French entente, 1904...485.
ecclesiastical appointments by, 527, 528.
Gladstone and, 102.
Prime Minister, 1894—1895...31, 35, 70, 78, 272.
proposals as to House of Lords disapproved by Queen, 371, 377, 419, 420, 441, 465.
resigns office in 1895...47, 298, 315, 397.
views on—Parliament Bill, 377, 406.
 Siam, 492.
- ROTHSCHILD, SIR L. DE, peerage refused to, 542.
- ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE, on India, 508.
- ROUVIER, M., yields to Germany, 487.
- ROWTON, LORD, 370.
- ROXBURGHE, DUKE AND DUCHESS OF, hostile to Gladstone, 464.
- ROYAL ASSENT. (See also Assent.)
- ROYAL BOTANICAL GARDENS, Kew, 236.
- ROYAL COLLEGE OF ART, 242.
- ROYAL COMMISSION ON HONOURS, 546, 547.
- ROYAL COMMISSIONS,
 objections to investigation of political issues by, 302, 303.
 Secretary of State for Home Affairs and, 212.
- ROYAL COMMISSIONS, FOR APPOINTMENTS, 211, 452.
- ROYAL ENTOURAGE, character of, 441—446.
- ROYAL EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS AND SEALS ACT, 1934...508, 509.
- ROYAL FAMILY, sanction of marriage of members of, 204, 531.
- ROYAL HOUSEHOLD, officers of the, 52, 171.
- ROYAL MARRIAGES ACT, 1772.
 sanction to marriages under, 204, 531.
 Windsor, Duke of, exempted from, 368.
- ROYAL MINT, 172, 231.
- ROYAL OBSERVATORIES, 228.
- ROYAL ORDER FOR EXPENDITURE, 196, 452, 453.
- ROYAL PROCLAMATIONS, 204, 451, 452.
- ROYAL SIGN MANUAL WARRANTS, uses of, 211, 213, 216, 219, 452.

ROYAL VICTORIAN CHAIN, 540, 544.

ROYAL VICTORIAN ORDER, personal to King, 487, 541.

RULE COMMITTEE OF THE SUPREME COURT, 207.

RUMANIA, autocracy established in (1937), 495.

RUMBOLD, SIR H., 107.

RUSSELL, LORD JOHN,

as Prime Minister—

1846—1852...36, 66, 67, 75.

1865—1866...31, 34, 36, 108.

foreign policy of, 469, 475.

letter on free trade by, 29.

manifesto to electors by, 319.

position of—

in 1845...66.

in 1851...39, 297, 393.

in 1852...53, 54, 58, 297.

in 1852—1855...129.

in 1855...37, 38, 108, 120, 127, 302.

relations of, with Lord Palmerston, 90, 102, 103, 424, 470, 471, 472, 474.

resignation of—

in 1852...297.

in 1866...297, 306, 394.

dissolves Ministry, 63.

seeks Cabinet advice on appointments, 56.

territorial titles of Roman Catholic hierarchy, attacked by, 112, 523, 532.

wishes peerages conferred on resignation in 1866...541.

RUSSIA, 281, 282, 471, 473, 479, 480, 481, 486, 487, 489, 491, 493, 497.

attitude of, in Czechoslovakian crisis, 557.

defence conversations in 1914 with, 92, 93.

RUSSIA, CZAR OF. (See also NICHOLAS II.)

Garter not given to, in 1866...541.

RUSSO-TURKISH HOSTILITIES, 137, 477, 478, 482.

RUTHENIA, 556.

SAFEGUARDS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL USAGE, 331, 332—355, 561.

“ SAFETY FIRST,” uninspiring election motto of Mr. Baldwin in 1929...
85, 255.

ST. ALBAN'S, disfranchised, 305.

ST. MICHAEL AND ST. GEORGE, Order of, 540.

ST. PATRICK,

Order of, 540, n., 543.

theft of jewels of, 511, 512.

SALARIES OF MINISTERS, 49, 50, 268, n.

- SALISBURY, THIRD MARQUIS OF,
 advises, as to successor, 42.
 consulted by Queen Victoria when out of office, 437, 464, 465.
 dissolution of, in 1900...293, 397.
 election manifesto of, 320.
 keeps facts as to Irish negotiations from Queen, 100, 101.
 Lord Privy Seal, 209.
 position of, in 1886...39, 40, 440, 441.
 presides over Imperial Defence Committee, 141.
 Prime Minister—
 in 1885—1886...32, 36, 38, 47, 69, 70, 296.
 in 1886—1892...32, 36.
 in 1895—1902...32, 36, 47.
 refuses Dukedom, 548.
 resigns—
 in 1886...300.
 in 1892...300.
 in 1902...11.
 submits to defeat in Cabinet, 126.
 urges visit of Duke of York to Australia, 502.
 views of—
 on Afghanistan, 500, 501.
 on Berlin Congress, 562.
 on ecclesiastical appointments, 527, 528, n. on Education Bill, 243.
 on forcing dissolution, 371.
 on foreign policy, 91, 137, 281, 282, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 492.
 on grant of dissolution, 394.
 on holding Cabinet, 131, n. on issues, 314.
 on non-consultation of Cabinet on foreign issues, 114.
 on position of Prime Minister, 76, 77.
 on promotion of relatives, 528, n.
 on propriety of consultation of Crown, before announcing policy, 371, 420, 441.
 on Royal Commission on South African War, 517.
 on war responsibility of Government, 516.

SALUTES, Crown regulates, 550.

SAMOA, surrender to Germany of (1899), 479, n.

SANCTIONS AGAINST ITALY, 280, 283.

SARAWAK, protected State, 222.

SARDINIA, acquisition by King of Irak on sovereignty, 469, 470.

SAUDI ARABIA, British concession of Italian rights over, 553.

SAVOY AND NICE, French claim to, 475.

SCENES IN HOUSE OF COMMONS, 322, 561.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN, question of, 471, 482.

SCHNADHORST, F., Liberal organiser, 268.

- SCOTLAND,
effect of Reform Act of 1832 on, 23, n.
Home Rule for, 350—353.
proposal to disestablish Church in, 391.
Secretary of State for, 49, 176, 190, 211, 215—217.
- SCOTSMAN*, political influence of, 277.
- SCOTTISH ARISTOCRACY, hostile to land reform, 466.
- SCOTTISH EDUCATION DEPARTMENT, 216.
- SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Queen Victoria's attitude towards, 529, n.
- SCOTTISH JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, appointed by Lord Chancellor, 207.
- SCOTTISH LIBERAL FEDERATION, 260.
- SCOTTISH NATIONAL PARTY, 217, 351.
- SCOTTISH OFFICE. (See SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND.)
- SCOTTISH PEASANTRY, Queen Victoria's knowledge of, 444.
- SCOTTISH UNIVERSITY COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL, 205.
- SEA FISH COMMISSION, 191, 216, 237.
- SEA FISH INDUSTRY ACT, 1938...237.
- SEA LORDS OF ADMIRALTY, 227, 228.
- SEAHAM ELECTORATE, rejects Mr. R. MacDonald, 86.
- SEALS, OFFICIAL, 211, 452.
- SECESSION, Dominion right to, 509.
- SECOND BALLOTS, 341.
- SECURITY AS TO ROYAL PROMISE OF NOVEMBER 16TH, 1910...405, 409.
- SECURITY, Cabinet, 151—156.
- SECURITY OF GOVERNMENTAL ACTIONS, 10—12.
- SECRET SERVICE FUND, 214, n.
Parliamentary reticence as to, 303.
- SECRET SESSION OF PARLIAMENT, 304.
- SECRET TREATIES, 284, 285.
- SECRETARIAT,
Mr. Lloyd George's, 81, 95.
of Cabinet, 133, 134, 147.
the, 210, 211.

SECRETARY AT WAR, 211, 224.

SECRETARY FOR MINES, 49.

SECRETARY OF STATE,

Air, 49, 52, 141, 189, 194.

Burma, 49, 141, 176, 211, 508, 540.

Colonies, 49, 141, 168, 176, 178, 179, 190, 210, 219, 220—223.

Dominion Affairs, 49, 141, 150, 190, 211, 220—223, 426, 427.

Foreign Affairs, 49, 54, 77, 80, 81, 82, 87, 90—96, 131, 135, 141, 147, 148, 149, 210, 211, 217—220, 221, 424, 425, 559.

Home Affairs, 49, 141, 143, 168, 189, 190, 204, n., 210, 211—215, 239, 428—430, 456.

India, 49, 97, 176, 177, 211, 425—427, 508, 540.

Scotland, 49, 176, 190, 211, 215—217.

War, 49, 52, 97, 98, 141, 184, 210—215.

SECRETARY TO THE COMMITTEE OF IMPERIAL DEFENCE, 133, 147, 190.

SECRETARY TO THE DEPARTMENT OF OVERSEAS TRADE, 49.

SECRETARY TO THE ECONOMIC ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 190.

SEELY, J. E. B., LORD MOTTISTONE, 106, 301, 380, 382.

SELBORNE, FIRST EARL OF, Lord Chancellor, 61.

SELBORNE, SECOND EARL OF, Governor of Transvaal, 158, 182, 503, 546.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON ESTIMATES, 192.

SELECTION OF PRIME MINISTER BY KING, 30—48.

SELF-DETERMINATION,

applied to Sudeten Germans, with grave defects, 556, 557.

logically due to Palestine Arabs, 557, 558.

territories taken as war spoils from Germany, 558.

SELKIRK, LORD, on ministerial responsibility, 380, n.

SEPARATION OF CABINET AND COUNCIL, 24—29.

SEPTENNIAL ACT, 1716...288.

SERBIA, 485, 486, 491.

SÈVRES, treaty of, 1921...95.

SHADOW CABINET, 29, 266, 274, 325.

SHAFTESBURY, LORD, 20.

SHAH OF PERSIA, receives Garter from Edward VII., 484, 544, 551.

SHELBURNE, MARQUIS OF, Prime Minister, 19.

SHERIFFS, appointment of, 204, 208, 230.

- SHIPPING, MINISTRY OF, 162, n.
- SHIPPING MATTERS, control of, 235.
- SHOPS (HOURS OF CLOSING) ACT, 1928...317, n.
- SHREWSBURY, DUKE OF, appointed Lord Treasurer in 1714...26.
- SIAM, maltreated by France, 492.
- SIAM, KING OF, K.G. refused to, 544.
- SIDELIGHTS ON QUEEN VICTORIA*, 442.
- SIMON, SIR JOHN, 51, 87, 93, 398, 554.
- SINCLAIR, SIR ARCHIBALD, Liberal leader, 43, 52, 58, 275, 435.
- SINHA, S., appointed to Viceroy's Council in 1909...119.
- SIX ACTS OF 1819...22.
- SMITH, F. E., 322, 374. (See also BIRKENHEAD.)
- SMITH, W. H. 87, 108, 119, 120, 417.
- SMUTS, J. C., General, in War Cabinet, 50.
- SNOWDEN, P., VISCOUNT, 58, 116, 138, 277, n., 435, 445.
- SOCIALIST LEAGUE, 263, 264.
- SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR ENGLAND, 244, 245, 246.
- SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND, 50, 246.
- SOLICITOR TO THE TREASURY 231.
- SOLOMON, SIR RICHARD, 503.
- SOMALILAND, withdrawal from, 504.
- SOMERSET, DUKE OF,
action of (1714), 26.
Queen Victoria's veto on appointment of, 60.
- SOMERSET, LORD GRANVILLE, political organiser, 257.
- SOUTH AFRICA, 279, 293, 331, n., 342.
- SOUTH AFRICA ACT, 1909...220, 221.
- SOUTH AFRICAN GARRISON, strength of, 519, 520.
- SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE TERRITORIES, 220, 221, 503.
- SOUTH AFRICAN WAR, 1899—1902...225, 461, 468, 481, 482, 515.
- SOUTH-WEST AFRICA, mandated territory, 222, 558, 566.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA, 220, 280.

SOVEREIGN,
the, and foreign policy, 468—495.
the, and internal affairs, 461—468.

SPAIN, 136, 283, 284, 289, 477, 487, 488.
failure of democracy in, 320, 321.
Mr. Chamberlain's hostility to, 558.

SPANISH MARRIAGES QUESTION, 469.

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, controls asking of questions, 168.
defeats obstruction in 1881...323.
determines leader of the opposition, 326.
grant of precedence to, 548, n.
position of, under Parliament Act, 330, 331, 407.
prevents criticism of King in Commons, 362, 366.
should have power to summon Commons when not in session, 561.

SPEAKER'S CONFERENCE ON DEVOLUTION, 353.

SPECIAL GRANTS COMMITTEE, Ministry of Pensions, 241.

SPEECH TO PARLIAMENT,
King's, approved by Cabinet, 9. responsibility for, 389—391, 445.

SPEECHES BY MINISTERS, restrictions on, 122, 123, 125.

SPENCER, EARL, Liberal peer, 35, 41, 53.

SPENDER, J. A., 92.

SPION KOP CORRESPONDENCE, wrongly published, 132, 420.

STAMFORDHAM, LORD, 433, 447, n.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON EMPIRE FORESTRY, 221.

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON LONDON TRANSPORT, 238.

STANLEY, LORD, later 14th Earl of Derby, action of, in 1851...37, 39, 45, 46, 51, 67.

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, LORD, 477.

STAR OF INDIA, Order of the, 500, 540.

STATE MANAGEMENT DISTRICTS COUNCIL, 190, 216.

STATIONERY OFFICE, 172.

STATUS OF UNION ACT, 1934, Union of South Africa, 2, 508.

STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER, 1931...280, 508.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES FOR BOROUGHHS, 213, 452.

- STOCKMAN, BARON, adviser of Queen Victoria, 102, n., 424, 432, 441, 442, 443.
- STRAFFORD, LORD, execution of, 358.
- STRATFORD CANNING, successful diplomacy in Switzerland, 471.
- STUARTS, ministerial responsibility under, 357, 358.
- SUBMISSION OF FOREIGN OFFICE DESPATCHES TO CROWN, 425.
- SUBORDINATE MINISTERS, 243—248.
- STUBBS, W., Bishop of Oxford, 527.
- SUDAN, 219, 281, 388, 496, 497, 498.
George VI. surrenders claim to sovereignty over, 219.
- SUDETEN GERMANS, self-determination for, 554.
- SUEZ CANAL SHARES, purchase of, 90, n.
- SUMMONS OF CABINET AND COUNCIL, mode of, 26.
- SUMNER, LORD, condemns mandate for Palestine, 557.
- SUNDERLAND, LORD, on Cabinet, 25.
- SUPERANNUATION ACTS, administered by Treasury, 202.
- SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 190.
- SUPPLY. (See ESTIMATES.)
- SUPREMACY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS IN FINANCE, 402.
- SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE, appointment of puisne and other judges in, 208, 537—540.
Rules Committee of, 207.
- SUPREME WAR COUNCIL, 165, 166.
- SURRENDER OF BRITISH AUTHORITY OVER AUSTRIA TO ITALY, 553.
- SUSSEX, DUKE OF, son of George III., 357, 368.
- SWAZILAND, 220, 503.
- SWEDEN, 335, 358, 487.
- SWIFT, DEAN, on ministerial responsibility, 20, 389.
- SWINTON, VISCOUNT, formerly Sir P. Cunliffe-Lister, 52, 174, 226, 227, 243, n.
- SWITZERLAND, 335, 343, 344, 346.

- TAIT, A. C., Archbishop of Canterbury, 436, 437, 526.
- TAMWORTH MANIFESTO, in 1834, by Sir R. Peel, 84, 313, 319.
- TANGANYIKA, mandated territory, 222, 558, 566.
- TANGIER, William II.'s visit to, March 31st, 1905...487.
- TAYLOR, SIR HENRY, Secretary to William IV., 401.
- TEMPLE, DR. F., Archbishop of Canterbury (1896—1902), 528.
- TEMPLE, DR. W., Archbishop of York, 529.
- TEMPLE, SIR WILLIAM, suggests plan for reform of Privy Council, 24, 25.
- TEMPLE, LORD, denies Cabinet responsibility, 28.
- TENNYSON, LORD, Poet Laureate, 536.
- TERRITORIAL ARMY, 519.
- TERRITORIAL ARMY ASSOCIATIONS, 225, 519.
- TERRITORIAL WATERS JURISDICTION ACT, 1878...214.
- TESCHEN, surrendered by Czechoslovakia to Poland, 558, n.
- THERAPEUTIC SUBSTANCES JOINT COMMITTEE, 240.
- THIRD INTERNATIONAL, 264.
- THISTLE, ORDER OF THE, 540, n., 548, n.
- THOMAS, J. H., 58, 115, 138, 173, 188, 209, 303, 435, 445.
- THOMSON, SIR W., Lord Kelvin, 542.
- THOMSON OF CARDINGTON, BRIG.-GEN. C. B., LORD, Secretary of State for Air (1924), 58.
- THREAT OF ABDICATION, royal, 387, 388, 478.
- THREE PARTY SYSTEM, nature of, 269—272.
right of Ministry to a dissolution affected by, 295.
- TIBET, British relations with, 504, 505.
- TIME-LAG IN PREPARATIONS OF DEMOCRACIES, 289.
- TIMES*, political influence of, 275, 276, 490.
urges dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, 584, n.
- TOGOLAND, mandated territory, 222.
- TORIES, 56, 65, 66.
- TORY MINISTERS UNDER ANNE, 15.

- TOWNSHEND, CHARLES, 17.
TRACTARIANS, 523.
TRACTS FOR THE TIMES, 523.
TRADE. (See Board of Trade.)
TRADE DISPUTES AND TRADE UNIONS ACT, 1927...265.
TRADE UNION ACT, 1913...265.
TRADE UNIONS AND LABOUR PARTY, 262—265.
TRAMWAYS ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 238.
TRANSFERS AS BETWEEN VOTES, &c. (See VIREMENT.)
TRANSPORT, MINISTRY OF, 49, 189, 237, 238.
TRANSPORT ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 238.
TRANSVAAL, 279, 324, 426, 427, 503.
TRANSVAAL CONSTITUTION, 1906, granted by prerogative, 206.
TREASURER OF THE LABOUR PARTY, 263.
TREASURER OF THE NAVY, 227.
TREASURY BOARD, 229. (See also Lords Commissioners of the Treasury.)
TREASURY CONTROL OVER DEPARTMENTS, 170, 171, 172, 188—202, 250.
TREASURY SOLICITOR'S OFFICE, 172, 231.
TREATIES, 284, 285.
 Board of Trade advises as to, 234.
 Foreign Office responsible for, 219.
 full powers—
 for signature and ratification of, 208, 211, 219.
 in case of Dominions, 453.
 territorial changes by, require sanction of Parliament, 281, 282.
 violation of, in case of League Covenant, 106, 268, 282, 283, 284, 312, 384, 385, 494, 509, n., 553, 558.
TREATY OF PEACE ACT, 1919...282.
TREATY WITH ITALY, April 16th, 1938...153, 269, 385, 494, 509, n., 553, 558.
TRENT AFFAIR, Prince Consort's influence in, 476.
TRINITY HOUSE, 171.
TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE, 231, 232.
TUPPER, SIR CHARLES, advises Lord Dufferin, 370.
TURKEY, 106, 107, 281, 417, 422, 450, 471, 485, 491, 557.
TURNER, S., protégé of Disraeli, 526.

- TUSCANY, 469, 475.
- TWEEDMOUTH, LORD, 55, 105, 266.
- TWO SICILIES, KING OF, 470, 471, 476.
- TYRONE AND FERMANAGH, question of exclusion from Government of Ireland Act, 375.
- UGANDA, Lord Rosebery's policy as to, 114.
- UKRAINE, German designs on, 556, 557.
- ULSTER, 374, 375, 376. (See also NORTHERN IRELAND.)
- ULSTER UNIONIST COUNCIL, 380, n.
- ULSTER VOLUNTEERS, 374.
- ULTIMATUM,
 submission by Mr. Chamberlain to,
 from Germany, 553—558.
 from Italy, 153, 494, 558.
- UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE. (See also PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE.)
- UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE ACT, 1934...239.
- UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE BOARD, 169, 170, 239, 250.
- UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE STATUTORY COMMITTEE, 239.
- UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE UMPIRE, 239.
- UNIFORMS, approved by Crown, 549, 550.
- UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA,
 Dominions Secretary conducts British relations with, 220, 221.
 King directly advised by, 508.
 position of Governor-General in, 533, n. refrains from grant of honours, 548.
 treaties concluded by, 453.
 views of,
 on divisibility of Crown, 509, 510.
 on neutrality, 509.
 on secession, 509.
- UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS. (See RUSSIA.)
- UNITED FREE CHURCH, unites with Church of Scotland, 530.
- UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, 468, 469, 476.
- UNIVERSITY GRANTS COMMITTEE, 231.
- USAGE, relation to convention, 6.
- UTRECHT, treaty of, creation of peers in connection with, 400.
- VATICAN,
 proposal to establish diplomatic relations with the, 469.
 visit of Edward VII. to the, 484.

VENETIA, proposed sale of, by Austria to Italy, 475.

VICEROY, meaning of title, 224.

VICTORIA, QUEEN,

abdication threatened by, 387, 388, 478.

attitude of,

 to Disraeli, 119, 432, 458, 477, 478, 492.

 to Gladstone, 320, 423, 432, 458, 463, 464, 465.

 to Melbourne, 357.

 to Peel, 357.

 to Salisbury, 100, 101, 458.

Cabinet letter to, 411.

chooses Prime Ministers, 31, 34—42, 45.

communications of, with ministers, 76, 77.

consultations by, on vacancy in Premiership, 39, 40, 41, 42.

controls formation of ministry, 59—61.

dislikes consultation of Cabinet in certain cases, 128—130.

dislikes result of elections, 1892...287, n.

dissolution of Parliament, opinions as to, 23, 393, 394.

inclined towards personal rule, 465.

information available to, 441—444.

mediation of,

 as regards Irish Church, 32, 436.

 as regards redistribution, 323, 437.

receives formal minutes from Cabinet, 132.

relations of,

 with Colonial Office, 426.

 with Commander-in-Chief, 446.

 with Foreign Office, 424, 425.

 with Home Office, 428, 429.

 with India Office, 425, 426.

 with Viceroy, 97.

 with War Office, 427, 428.

views of,

 on appointments, 533, 534.

 on Colonial affairs, 495, 496.

 on defence, 512—516.

 on ecclesiastical questions, 522—528, 529, 530.

 on foreign affairs, 468—482, 492.

 on honours, 541, 548, 550, 551.

 on Indian affairs, 448, 449, 499—502.

 on internal affairs, 461—465.

 on Ireland, 510, 511, 515.

 on Irish Church, 323.

 on Ladies of Bedchamber, 64.

 on pardons, 429.

 on police force, 430.

 on Queen's speech, 389—391.

 on selection of diplomats, 183, 184.

 on speeches on resignation of ministers, 152.

 on territorial cessions, 281.

wishes to force dissolution of Parliament, 370, 371, 372.

wishes to secure resignation of ministers on defeat before Parliament meets, 299, 300.

- VICTORIA EUGENIE, PRINCESS, marries King of Spain, 468, 531.
- VICTUALLING BOARD, 227.
- VIKTORIA, Princess of Prussia, 481.
- VILLAFRANCA, peace of, 475.
- VIREMENT, transfers between sub-heads, and service votes, 197, 198.
- VIRTUAL REPRESENTATION, doctrine of, 21, 22.
- VISITS, official, Crown regulates, 550.
- VOTES,
 financial, Parliamentary, 197—199.
 of credit, 199.
- WALES, self-government for, 353.
- WALKING OUT OF MR. BALFOUR'S PARTY AS PROTEST, 289, n.
- WALLACE COLLECTION, 172, 231.
- WALPOLE, ROBERT, virtually Prime Minister, 16, n., 17, 26, 544.
- WALPOLE, SPENCER, minister without portfolio, 54, 104.
- WALTON, SIR LAWSON, not given natural promotion, 538.
- WAR,
 position of Government regarding conduct of operations of, 163—166, 516, 521, 522.
 Secretary of State for, 49, 52, 97, 98, 141, 164, 210—215, 564, n.
- WAR BOOK, 140.
- WAR CABINET, 54, 79, 80, 112, 125, 129, 130, 138, 155, 156—166.
- WAR COMMITTEE, 133, 142.
- WAR COUNCIL, 133, 141, 156.
- WAR OFFICE. (See WAR, SECRETARY OF STATE FOR.)
- WAR OFFICE RECONSTITUTION COMMITTEE, 443.
- WARD, COL. J., on subordination of army to civil power, 461, n.
- WARREN, SIR CHARLES, Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, 430.
- WATSON, SIR WILLIAM, receives civil list pension, 537, n.
- WATTS, G. F., honour refused to, 542.
- WEI-HAI-WEI, temporarily in British hands, 281.
- WEIZMANN, DR., Zionist leader, 177.

WELLESLEY, COL. F. A., secret mission to Alexandra II., 477, n.

WELLESLEY, DEAN, 525.

WELLINGTON, DUKE OF,

advises William IV., 431.

Catholic emancipation approved by, 22.

consulted in 1851...39, 433.

declines office in 1832...401.

on issues at election, 313.

position in 1834 of, 31, 64.

removal of statue of, 126.

resigns in 1830...46.

takes office in 1828...65.

without portfolio, 53, 55, 57.

WEMYSS, ADMIRAL SIR W., desires to force Dardanelles, 100.

WESTBURY, LORD, forced resignation of, 301.

WESTERN SAMOA, mandated territory, 222.

WHEAT ACT, 1932...237.

WHEAT COMMISSION, 237.

WHIG MINISTRIES, under William III. and Anne, 15, 16.

WHIGS, 37, 38, 56, 66, 67, 78, 256, 257, 275, 313.

WHIPS,

governmental and opposition, 124, 267, 271, 325, 326.

position of, as regards honours, 545.

WHITE-RIDLEY, SIR M., removed from Cabinet, 104.

WHITELEY, WILLIAM, reprieve of murderer of, 429.

WIGRAM, SIR CHARLES, LORD, useful advice of, 442.

WILKES, JOHN, 27, 389.

WILLIAM II., German Emperor (1888—1918), 468, 478, 483, 487, 489, 490, 551.

WILLIAM III., 15, 25, 313, 319, 358.

WILLIAM IV.,

attitude of, in 1831...393.

Private Secretary of, 441.

relations of, with Lord Melbourne, 64, 65, 66, 67, 361, 362, 363, 365, 369.

WILLINGDON, MARQUIS OF, restores order in India, 83.

WILSON, ADMIRAL SIR A., 157.

WILSON, F.M. SIR HENRY, 97, 115, 163, 165, 166, 179, 182, 380, 522.

WINDSOR, H.R.H. DUKE OF, 368, 541, n.

WINDSOR, CANONS AND DEANERY OF, royal concern in, 525.

WINDSOR, HOUSE OF, style of, 550.

WINTERTON, EARL,

 Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, 52, 174, 243.
 unjust attack by, on Russia (admitted by Prime Minister, November 14th, 1938; satisfaction given to Russia), 557.

WITHHOLDING OF SUMMONSES TO PEERS, unconstitutional, 404.

WITTE, COUNT, Finance Minister of Russia, 486, 487.

WOLSELEY, SIR GARNET,

 1st Viscount, 514, 515, 534, 535, n., 542.
 communications to, from Queen, 447, 497.

WOLVERHAMPTON, 1ST VISCOUNT, 55.

WOMEN, votes for, 311, 317, n., 487.

WOMEN ELECTORS, political inexperience of, 253.

WOMEN'S LIBERAL FEDERATION, 259, n., 260.

WOOD, SIR KINGSLEY, Secretary of State for Air, 52, 176, 227, 243, n.

WORKS,

 control of expenditure on, 192.
 Office of, 49, 53, 65, 244.

WORKERS' AND SOLDIERS' COUNCILS, effort to establish in war, 252.

WRITS FOR ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, 453.

WYNDHAM, GEORGE,

 on Prime Minister's right to dissolve, 397.
 promotes Irish settlement, 511.

YEMEN, British concession of Italian rights over, 553.

YORK, DUKE OF, later George V., visits Australia, 502.

YOUNGER, SIR GEORGE, influence of, 262.

YOUNGHUSBAND, COL., in Tibet, 505.

YPRES. (See FRENCH.)

ZINOVIEFF LETTER, affects 1924 election, 72, 118, 255.

ZULULAND, campaign in, 514, n., 515.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

of

STEVENS & SONS, LIMITED

Hood & Challis's Property Acts

The Property, Settled Land, Trustee and Administration Acts and other Recent Acts affecting Conveyancing. With commentaries. Eighth Edition (1938).
By J. H. BORASTON, M.A., B.C.L., of the Inner Temple and Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law.

Net £1 : 10s. Postage 9d.

Since the seventh edition of this work appeared in 1909, the whole law of property for England and Wales has been recast in a new mould. It follows inevitably that, at first view, the present edition bears little resemblance to its forerunner. Few of the Acts round which the seventh edition was written find any place at all in the text of the present volume. Yet very many of the sections and sub-sections of the old Acts are to be discovered in the new Acts. In the event, it has been found possible to incorporate with such alterations as the new statutory provisions and fresh decisions have dictated, the great bulk of the notes of the former edition.

It has, in fact, been sought deliberately to preserve as much as possible of the original work of Messrs. Hood and Challis. If it has been necessary to add a considerable quantity of entirely new matter both in the text and in the notes, as little as possible of the material which formed the character and won the popularity of "Hood & Challis" has been omitted.

It will be appreciated, however, that the regrouping in the new Acts of those portions of the old Acts which survived the cataclysm of 1925 has involved a complete reshuffling of the old notes. It has been astonishing, and a tribute to the soundness of the original work, how many have fitted in. Nearly all of them will be found in one part or another, brought up-to-date in their new places in accordance with the reported decisions of the Courts.

Prideaux's Conveyancing

Forms and Precedents. Twenty-third Edition (1938-7). In three volumes.
By RANALD M. C. MUNRO, B.A., and Sir LANCELOT H. ELPHINSTONE,
M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barristers-at-Law.

Net £6 : 6s. Postage 2s.

"The appearance of another edition of Prideaux is an event of major importance in the conveyancer's career. There are, of course, other excellent books of precedent, but Prideaux maintains its pride of place not only for its comprehensiveness, but for the logic of its forms. It is, in fact, conceived and executed in the grand manner, and the present Editors have been fully conscious of this in preparing the present edition. The Novice who is initiated by way of Prideaux not only knows how, but why . . ."—The Solicitor.

Palmer's Company Law

A Practical Book for Lawyers and Business Men. With an Appendix containing the Companies Act, 1929, and the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1929. Sixteenth Edition (1938). By ALFRED F. TOPHAM, LL.M., K.C., Bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and A. M. R. TOPHAM, Barrister-at-Law.

Net £1 : 5s. Postage 9d.

"Palmer retains all its fascination and lucidity and to the constant query of the harassed student, 'What should I read in company law?' now and always we give the invariable answer: 'Palmer is most strongly recommended.'"
—Law Notes.

"The reappearance of their (Mr. Topham, K.C., and his son) names on the title page is in itself no small assurance that the profession may rely upon a painstaking and thorough revision. Let it be said at once that we have not traced any omission of a case bearing upon company law which has been decided between the publication of the last and of the present edition or any inaccuracy in the new matter incorporated. . . . Palmer remains what it was—the leading and indispensable narrative text-book on company law. Lawyers and business men have once again to thank these learned editions for their labours."
—The Law Quarterly Review.

"Of especial use to students and business men who need a clear exposition by a master hand."—Law Journal.

Palmer's Company Precedents

Fifteenth Edition (1937-38). By ALFRED F. TOPHAM, LL.M., K.C., Bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and A. M. R. TOPHAM, B.A., Barrister-at-Law.

Part. I.—General Forms. Net £3 : 15s. Postage 1s.

Part II.—Winding-up Forms and Practice. Net £3 : 3s. Postage 10d.

Part III.—Debentures and Debenture Stock. Net £2 : 15s. Postage 9d.

"At this stage in the history of this basic work on company law, there is little that the reviewer can say concerning Palmer. Either you do not know the work, in which case you are not a company lawyer, or you do, in which case comment is superfluous. You know that it stands in a class by itself, as the inevitable work to which the practitioner has recourse in matters of drafting. Together with Palmer's treatise upon the law itself, these three volumes of Precedents form a library upon company law, which is sufficiently complete to require very little by way of supplement."—The Solicitor.

"Palmer's Company Precedents are indispensable to every company lawyer."—Solicitors' Journal.

"Palmer's Precedents, in three volumes, is a unique book which every lawyer who has much to do with companies, finds quite indispensable. There are no substitutes: one must have Palmer whatever else one has."—The Law Times.

"There are perhaps half-a-dozen books of precedents which are so generally recognised as supreme that every practising lawyer relies on them. Palmer's Company Precedents is one of these."—Cambridge Law Journal.

Palmer's Private Companies

Their Formation and Advantages, being a concise popular statement for Business Men of the Mode of Converting a Business into a Private Company. With Notes on Limited Partnerships. Thirty-seventh Edition (1938). Net 2s. Postage 3d.

Gatley on Libel and Slander

With Precedents of Pleadings, &c. Third Edition (1938). By RICHARD O'SULLIVAN, K.C., Recorder of Derby. Net £3 : 3s. Postage 1s.

EXTRACT FROM LORD ATKIN'S FOREWORD.

I know of no book that affords a better guide on these topics than this work of the late Dr. Gatley. It has deservedly arrived at a new edition, and the completeness of the survey has been carefully maintained by the experience and diligence of the present editor. If I were required to point to special features, I should draw attention to the very full and accurate treatment of the subject of qualified privilege in the successive chapters dealing with that subject. The authorities have been so fully stated that though the book is far from being a mere digest, practitioners will often find it unnecessary to have the authority cited open on their desk. A valuable feature of the work is the frequent references to Dominion and American decisions, references to which are all the more valuable at a time when publication of defamatory matter is often world wide. I can strongly recommend this work both to prospective plaintiffs and defendants and to their legal advisers and to those who wish to avoid being the one or having recourse to the others. It is a good book.

"Mr. Gatley's book emerges triumphant from the most critical examination."

"The book is confined to civil actions, but within that sphere it is complete. The law is stated clearly and accurately and all the relevant authorities are cited. Particularly happy is the use made of American and colonial cases. They are used throughout the book as supplementing English authority on questions which may well arise for consideration where there is little authority directly in point in this country."

"Partly but not entirely as a result of citing cases decided abroad, Mr. Gatley's book deals with some questions which are not considered in other books on the subject."

"The forms and precedents also cover some new ground."

"On some matters Mr. Gatley is not in agreement with other writers on the subject. In such cases he is careful to state fully the reasons for his view and, as a rule, compels assent."—The Law Quarterly Review.

Ball's Libel and Slander

The Law of Libel and Slander. Second Edition (1936). By W. VALENTINE BALL, O.B.E., M.A., a Master of the Supreme Court, and PATRICK BROWNE, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Net 10s. Postage 6d.

"The Editors are to be congratulated most heartily on an admirable piece of work. The book is accurate, scholarly and interesting, and will prove useful both to the lawyer and the layman. . . . We have no hesitation in saying that no better introduction to this difficult but interesting subject can be found than in these pages. The book has the additional advantage of being entirely up-to-date."—The Law Quarterly Review.

Wharton's Law Lexicon

Forming an Epitome of the Laws of England under Statute and Case Law, and containing Explanations of Technical Terms and Phrases, Ancient, Modern, and Commercial, with Selected Titles relating to the Civil, Scots and Indian Law. Fourteenth Edition (1938). By A. S. OPPÉ, Barrister-at-Law.

Net £2 : 10s. Postage 1s.

"There is really no subject of the law which the work does not touch, and on all the more important topics there are concise and well-written articles with citations of the leading authorities which turn it into a small Encyclopædia."—The Law Journal.

Wills on Evidence

The Law of Evidence in Civil and Criminal Cases. Third Edition (1938). With the text of, and a commentary on, the Evidence Act, 1938. By JOHN DENMAN FINLAISON, M.A., LL.B., Cantab., of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law.

Net £1 : 5s. Postage 6d.

The aim of this book is to present the principles of the theory and practice of Evidence in a clear and readable form, and at the same time to incorporate enough detail to render the book of real practical value to those engaged in the profession of the law.

The editor has followed the general plan of the previous editions and has endeavoured throughout, not to propound any statement without some good authority to support it; and, when possible, several authorities are given in support and illustration of the same proposition. The Evidence Act, 1938, which is now in force, has of course necessitated alterations throughout, particularly in those chapters dealing with the various classes of Declarations.

The 1938 Act is set out in full in the appendix.

Earengey's Hire-Purchase

By HIS HONOUR JUDGE EARENGEY, K.C. Second Edition (1938).

Net £1 : 1s. Postage 6d.

"... it is to the hire trader what Copinger on Copyright is to the music publisher. It was inevitable that a new edition of Earengey would be issued, but we had not hoped that it would appear so quickly or cover the new ground so completely... The second edition is remarkable for the additions to the general text, and more particularly for the fact that wherever the text is affected by the new Act, reference is noted by heavy type: this, running all through the book is evidence of the thorough revision. But the value of the new edition to laymen and lawyers alike is the commentary, amounting to forty pages, on each successive section."—Musical Opinion.

Moller's Manual of Farm Law

By N. H. MOLLER, M.A., LL.M. Cantab., Barrister-at-Law. Author of "Voluntary Covenants in Restraint of Trade" and "The Law of Civil Aviation" (1938).

Net £1. Postage 6d.

The author has here gathered together in a form convenient to the use of the farmer and his advisers that legal material which covers the wide range of his activities and which defines his position in relation to land holdings and land owning generally. It is hoped, also, the work will have its uses in giving a definite answer to the more general questions which arise and indicating the proper line of enquiry in matters which are not so clear.

The text is arranged in some seventy-five titles in alphabetical order, reference to which is made easy by head-notes and an index.

Vinter's Fiduciary Relationship

A Treatise on the History and Law of Fiduciary Relationship and Resulting Trusts, together with a selection of cases. By ERNEST VINTER, M.A., LL.M. Cantab., Solicitor. Second Edition (1938).

Net £1 : 1s. Postage 6d.

In this new edition certain allied subjects have been dealt with as well as those which more directly are included under the denomination of Fiduciary Relationship. New chapters have been added dealing with decisions on various gifts of life policies, particularly those taken out by a husband or parent for the benefit of his wife or children, and also with Resulting and Imperfect Gifts. The author also discusses transactions effected for the purpose of avoiding taxation, as most of these directly or indirectly take the form of gifts.

Cripps on Compensation

The Law of Compensation for Land acquired under Compulsory Powers. Eighth Edition (1938). By ROBERT A. GORDON, M.A., LL.M., K.C., a Bencher of the Inner Temple, Recorder of Margate ; Author of "Compulsory Acquisition of Land and Compensation."

Net £2 : 15s. Postage 1s.

"Each of the chapters in this edition is clear, clean and concise. All the work of revision and addition has been well done, and 'Cripps on Compensation,' remains the best text-book on a difficult subject of great importance."—Law Times.

"This new edition has been prepared with that thoroughness which has been characterised by its predecessors. . . . and it is difficult to imagine the local authority's legal library without this comprehensive and authoritative volume."—Municipal Engineer and Public Journal.

"Town clerks and clerks to councils in particular, who have a constant and growing pre-occupation with injurious affection as the activities of local authorities expand, should insist on adding the new edition to the office library."—Justice of the Peace.

The Law Relating to Road Users' Rights, Liabilities and Insurance

By HECTOR HUGHES, of Gray's Inn and the Middle Temple, one of His Majesty's Counsel. With a Foreword by The Right Hon. LORD ATKIN. (1938.)

Net £1 : 10s. Postage 6d.

"This work provides a clear, accurate and comprehensive treatment of a subject of bewildering difficulty, and yet of great practical importance."—Law Notes.

Trial of Motor Car Accident Cases

By A. D. GIBB, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition (1938).

Net £1 : 10s. Postage 6d.

"Armed with this edition and the author's companion volume on the Law of Collisions on Land, the advocate should require nothing further but a prima facie case and an intelligent and an impartial jury, the work is excellent in matter, original in treatment and indispensable in practice."—Law Notes.

"With such a book at his elbow no practitioner need fear to conduct any case in this increasingly important, difficult, and constantly changing branch of law."—Juridical Review.

The Law of Collisions on Land

By A. D. GIBB, Barrister-at-Law. Fourth Edition (1938).

Net £1 : 10s. Postage 6d.

"A book like this has become a necessity, not merely a convenience, to the practitioner. Two of the main topics with which it deals, railways and motor cars, have gone far beyond the limen of the common law. There is a mass of legislation affecting them, and now insurance with respect to motor vehicles has become so important that Mr. Gibb has written a special chapter on it."—The Law Quarterly Review.

Gottschalk's Impossibility of Performance in Contract

By RUDOLF GOTTSCHALK, Dr.Iur.Utr., LL.M. Lond., of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law ; Advocate, Member of the Palestine Bar, late of the German Bar.

Net 7s. 6d. Postage 6d.

In this book the Author attempts to state the law as to impossibility of performance in contract, and the doctrine of frustration, and it is hoped that it will fulfil a want, as there is no other text-book on the subject, the doctrine is nowhere very clearly expressed, and the decisions assume many different forms.

The work is divided into three parts, as follows:—

- I. The development of the doctrine of supervening impossibility in English law.
- II. The problem in principle.
- III. The restatement of the law by the American Law Institute, with criticisms of the doctrine by eminent American lawyers, and there are Appendices in which the rules of Roman-Dutch Law, German Law and French Law are summarised.

Wicks's Consideration in the Law of Simple Contract

Being the Lee Essay Prize of the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn for the year 1938. By JAMES WICKS, B.A., LL.B., of Christ Church, Oxford, and of Gray's Inn. (1938.)

In the Press.

Konstam's Income Tax

A Treatise on the Law, designed for the use of the Taxpayer and his Advisers. Seventh Edition (1936—38). By HIS HONOUR JUDGE KONSTAM, K.C. With a Supplement to 1938, incorporating the Finance Acts, 1937 and 1938, and the recent decisions.

Net £2 : 2s. Postage 9d.

Supplement separately, 5s. net.

"The whole field is indeed covered by this admirable treatise, which at once takes its place as the leading work on the subject."—Law Journal.

"A reliable and courageous guide to the law of Income Tax. We use the word 'courageous' advisedly; because, while he is never dogmatic, the author does not hesitate to express his views on doubtful or open points. Wherefore the taxpayer and the legal profession have learnt to look to him for light in dark places, and not to look in vain."—Law Quarterly Review.

Risdon on Reversions

The Practice and Law relating to Sales and Mortgages of Reversions and other Interests under Wills, Settlements, &c., and of Policies of Assurance. By A. V. RISDON, Solicitor, Author of "Modern Administration and Probate Practice and Law." (1938.)

Net £1 : 10s. Postage 6d.

The Lawyer's Companion & Diary

Ninety-third Edition (1939). Part I. Edited by MORTON F. PARISH, a Member of the Law Society. Full particulars on application.

Prices 5s. to 14s. 6d.

The Diary contains all the useful information required for everyday practice. The 1939 issue includes the new County Court Fees as well as the Costs which appeared in the previous edition, and other up-to-date information.

There is also a directory of Judges, Counsel, London and Country Solicitors, &c. Under each town in the country list there are shown the appropriate County Court and Bankruptcy Court—a feature that will readily be appreciated by the busy practitioner.

It contains a mass of information relating to Government Offices, Costs and Fees, and Tables of Death Duties, Income Tax, Annuities, Interest, Repayment of Loans, &c.

Latey's Law of Divorce

The Law and Practice in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. Twelfth Edition (1939). Incorporating OAKLEY'S DIVORCE PRACTICE. By WILLIAM LATEY, Barrister-at-Law, and D. PERRONET REES, of the Divorce Registry.

In the Press.

Calton's Tables of Conveyancing Costs

Tables of Conveyancing, Land Registry, and Probate and Administration Costs, as amended by General Orders, with explanatory Notes and Precedents. By A. GEO. CALTON. Second Edition (1936). Net 7s. 6d. Postage 6d.

"It would be difficult to find anything more adequate to meet the needs of the practitioner or his clerks in such a compass. It can be heartily recommended as a book to buy and keep in the drawer of every conveyancer's desk."—The Conveyancer.

Bolton's Apportionment Tables

Showing the Proportion for any Number of Days of any Rate or other Yearly or Half-Yearly Amounts for the use of Solicitors, Accountants, Insurance and Estate Agents, Property Owners, Surveyors of Taxes, and the Rating, Water, Gas and Electricity Departments of Local Authorities, &c. By H. BOLTON.

Net £1 : 5s. Postage 6d.

"It would be interesting to work out how many hours of tedious labour will be saved, how many disastrous mistakes will be avoided, and how many laborious checks will be dispensed with, as a result of the employment of these tables. The sum total would certainly be very large . . . will be indispensable, and its usefulness immediately apparent."—Local Government Journal.

The Law of Mortgages

By H. G. HANBURY, D.C.L., M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, University Lecturer in Law, Assistant Reader in Equity to the Inns of Court, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, sometime Vinerian Scholar and Rhodes Travelling Fellow, and C. H. M. WALDOCK, B.C.L., M.A., Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford, Lecturer in Law at Oriel College, Oxford, of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law.

Net £1 · 5s. Postage 6d.

"A want long felt by legal students and young practitioners has now been thoroughly filled by The Law of Mortgages, by Mr. H. G. Hanbury and Mr. C. H. Meredith Waldock. . . . Hanbury & Waldock has been so well done that it has obviously come to stay. It is a handy volume of about 500 pages; there are nine chapters, and the second of these—'The Creation of Mortgages and Charges'—should be glanced at as being typical of the rest. The chapter is most attractively and clearly written; it is short and comprehensive; the subject is dealt with 'philosophically' and unconventionally; and there are illuminating paragraphs and phrases which in a flash show the student something of how things have come to be as they are . . . Here is a book which will help many to take a keen interest in and get a vivid and lasting idea of our English Law of Mortgages."—The Law Times.

"Surveyed as a whole, this book leaves an impression of clarity and completeness. It presents an excellent survey of the modern law, with occasional illuminating excursions into the history of its developments."—The Solicitor.

Hanbury's Modern Equity

The Principles of Equity. By H. G. HANBURY, D.C.L., M.A., University Lecturer in Equity ; Tutor, The Law Society's School of Law, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition (1937).

Net £1 : 10s. Postage 9d.

"Written in an exceptionally clear and attractive style . . . a most readable and lucid work on, perhaps the most difficult branch of their studies . . . admirably suited for preparation for examinations, reference in practice, and very pleasant reading."—Law Notes.

"Mr. Hanbury's style is clear and makes comparatively easy reading, and the author has a happy knack of illustrating principles by well-chosen examples and emphasizing them by carefully selected quotations from judgments. This book will prove a serious rival to those hitherto in use."—Law Quarterly Review.

"The present volume is undoubtedly important. Its importance lies not only in the fact that it will, in the reviewer's opinion, supplant the existing English text-books on Equity, but that it may be taken as the high-water mark of the traditional English treatment of Equity."—Canadian Bar Review.

"The whole work is conceived and written with a spirited freshness and a challenge to preconceptions which will appeal to the practitioner as well as rouse the student . . . we predict that Mr. Hanbury's book will take a deservedly high place among the major treatises."—Journal of the Society of Public Teachers of Law.

MODERN LAW WORKS

of

STEVENS & SONS, LIMITED

A LEGAL NOVELTY				s. d.
PARISH	The Legal Gazetteer and Courts Indicator ... 1935 .			5 0
	A Ready Reference Legal Guide to London and the Home Counties. ACCOUNTS
KETTRIDGE	Bookkeeping for Solicitors 1934 .			5 0
ADMIRALTY
ROSCOE	Admiralty Law and Practice ... 5th ed. 1931 .			42 0
ROSCOE	Studies in the History of the Admiralty and Prize Courts 1932 .			5 0
ADULTERATION
BARTLEY	The Adulteration of Food 4th ed. 1929 .			12 6
ADVOCACY
HARRIS	Hints on Advocacy 17th ed. 1937 .			10 0
AGRICULTURAL LAW —See also FARM LAW.
SPENCER	Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 ... 8th ed. 1931 .			12 6
SPENCER	Small Holdings and Allotments Acts ... 3rd ed. 1927 .			12 6
ALIENS
DAVIES	The English Law relating to Aliens 1931 .			10 0
ANNUAL PRACTICES —See also DIGEST and STATUTES.
	The Annual County Courts Practice 1939 .			42 0
	The Annual Practice. The White Book ... 1939 .			45 0
BOWIE	The A. B. C. Guide to the Practice of the Supreme Court... 1939 .			7 6
	The A. B. C. Guide to the Practice of the County Court 1939 .			7 6
ANNUITIES
BOWLES	Testamentary Annuities 1931 .			7 6
APPORTIONMENT TABLES
BOLTON	Apportionment Tables shewing the Proportion for any Number of Days of any Rate or other Yearly or Half-Yearly Amounts 1927 .			25 0
ARBITRATION
RUSSELL	Arbitration and Award 13th ed. 1935 .			42 0
ARCHITECT
BRICE	The Law relating to the Architect 1925 .			10 0

			s. d.
AUCTIONS
HART	The Law of Auctions, Estate Agency, Valuation and Commission3rd ed. 1930 . 15	0
AVERAGE
LOWNDES	The Law of General Average6th ed. 1922 . 42	0
BANKING
HART	The Law of Banking and Stock Exchange Transactions. 2 vols...4th ed. 1931 . 63	0
BANKRUPTCY
LAWRENCE	Deeds of Arrangement	10th ed. 1931 . 12	0
WILLIAMS	The Law and Practice in Bankruptcy...15th ed. 1937 . 50		0
BILLS OF EXCHANGE
CHALMERS	The Law of Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes and Negotiable Securities ...10th ed. 1932 . 25		0
BUILDING SOCIETIES
WURTZBURG	The Law relating to Building Societies...7th ed. 1935 . 20		0
CARRIERS
CARVER	The Law of Carriage of Goods by Sea...8th ed. 1938 . 50		0
DISNEY	The Law of Carriage by Railway ...8th ed. 1929 . 12		6
FLETCHER	The Carrier's Liability	1932 . 12	6
MACNAMARA	The Law of Carriers by Land3rd ed. 1925 . 40	0
TEMPERLEY	The Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924..4th ed. 1932 . 10		0
WILLIAMSON	The Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 ... 1934 . 12		6
CHANCERY
DANIELL	Chancery Forms7th ed. 1932 . 70	0
DANIELL	Chancery Practice. 2 vols.8th ed. 1914 . 105	0
CHILDREN
BULLOCK	The Law as to Children and Young Persons ... 1933 . 15		0
MESTON	The Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 ... 1933 . 7		6
C.I.F.
KENNEDY	C.I.F. Contracts	2nd ed. 1928 . 10	0
CIVIL ACTIONS
ROSCOE	The Law of Evidence on the Trial of Civil Actions. Thick or thin paper. 20th ed. 1934 . 60		0
COLLISIONS AT SEA
MARSDEN	The Law of Collisions at Sea9th ed. 1934 . 40	0
BOSCOE	The Measure of Damages in Actions of Maritime Collisions3rd ed. 1929 . 12	6
COLLISIONS ON LAND—See also ROAD USERS.
GIBB	The Law of Collisions on Land...4th ed. 1938 . 30	0
GIBB	The Trial of Motor Car Accident Cases...2nd ed. 1938 . 30		0

			s.	d.
COMMON LAW
SHIRLEY	Leading Cases in the Common Law.	11th ed. 1931 .	25	0
COMPANY LAW
BUCKLEY	The Companies Act, 1929 ...	11th ed. 1930 .	52	6
CHARLESWORTH	The Principles of Company Law	2nd ed. 1938 .	7	6
PALMER	Company Law	16th ed. 1938 .	25	0
PALMER	Company Precedents
	Part 1. General Forms	1938 .	75	0
	Part 2. Winding-up Forms and Practice ...	1937 .	63	0
	Part 3. Debentures and Debenture Stock ...	1938 .	55	0
PALMER	Private Companies	37th ed. 1936 .	2	0
PALMER	Shareholders', Directors' and Voluntary Liquidators' Legal Companion.	34th ed. 1936 .	5	0
SOPHIAN	The Companies Act, 1929 1929 .	10	6
SUTCLIFFE	Statutory Companies and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Acts	1924 .	7	6
COMPENSATION
CRIPPS	The Law of Compensation ...	8th ed. 1938 .	55	0
GORDON	Compulsory Acquisition of Land and Compensation2nd ed. 1936 .	12	6
CONFLICT OF LAWS —See INTERNATIONAL LAW.
CONSTITUTIONAL LAW —See also ENGLISH LAW.
KEITH	The British Cabinet System	1938 .	—	0
RIDGES	The Constitutional Law of England ...6th ed. 1937 .	21	0	0
CONTRACTS
BRIGGS	Notes on " Pollock's Contracts "	1937 .	5	0
CAPORN	Selected Cases on Commercial Contracts ...	1937 .	12	6
CHAMPNESS	Mistake in the Law of Contract	1933 .	5	0
FRY	The Specific Performance of Contracts...6th ed. 1921 .	50	0	0
GOTTSCHALK	Impossibility of Performance in Contract ...	1938 .	7	6
LEAKE	The Law of Contracts8th ed. 1931 .	45	0
POLLOCK	Principles of Contract	10th ed. 1936 .	30	0
ROWE	Cases on Contracts	1927 .	15	0
WICKS	Consideration in the Law of Simple Contract ...	1938 .	—	0
CONVEYANCING
HOOD	Property, Settled Land, Trustee and Administration Acts8th ed. 1938 .	30	0
PRIDEAUX	Forms and Precedents in Conveyancing.
	3 vols.	23rd ed. 1936-7 .	126	0
WOLSTENHOLME	Conveyancing Statutes, &c. 2 vols.	12th ed. 1932 .	84	0
CORONERS
JERVIS	The Office and Duties of Coroners ...7th ed. 1927 .	21	0	0
COSTS
CALTON	Tables of Conveyancing, Land Registry, and Probate and Administration Costs	2nd ed. 1936 .	7	6
COUNCILS
WIGHTWICK	District Councils	2nd ed. 1935 .	15	0

COURT-HAND RESTORED— See also RECORD INTERPRETER.					s. d.
WRIGHT	Court-Hand Restored	10th ed. 1912	. 21 0
COVENANTS
JOLLY	Restrictive Covenants affecting Land.	2nd ed. 1931	.	10	0
CRIMINAL LAW
ARCHBOLD	Pleading, Evidence and Practice in Criminal Cases	30th ed. 1938	. 52 6
DISNEY	Criminal Law	2nd ed. 1926	. 10 0
LIECK	The Criminal Justice Acts, 1914—26.	2nd ed. 1927	.	12	6
ODGERS	Leading Cases in the Criminal Law	1932	. 15 0
	Being the 6th edition of "Warburton."
ROSCOE	The Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases.	15th ed. 1928	.	52	6
RUSSELL	Crime—A Treatise on Felonies and Mis-demeanours.	2 vols.9th ed. 1936	. 100 0
TOUCHE	Criminal Procedure	2nd ed. 1933	. 7 6
CROWN PRACTICE
ROBERTSON	Crown Practice	1908 . 42 0
DAMAGES
JACKSON	The Law of Damages	1934 . 6 0
DANGEROUS THINGS
CHARLESWORTH	Liability for Dangerous Things	1922 . 10 0
DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT— See BANKRUPTCY. DICTIONARIES— See also LAWYER'S REPERTORY.
HUGHES	The Student's Law Dictionary	1936	. 8 0
OLVER	French-English Dictionary of Legal and Commercial Terms	1925	. 5 0
STROUD	The Judicial Dictionary	2nd ed. 1903	. 42 0
STROUD	Supplemental Volume	1931 . 42 0
WHARTON	Law Lexicon	14th ed. 1938	. 50 0
DIGEST
MEWS	A Digest of English Case Law.	2nd ed.	...	—	—
	Complete to 1937. Price on application.
MEWS	Annual Digest. With Quarterly Advance Parts	—	—	21	0
DIVORCE— See also MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT.
LATEY	The Law of Divorce	12th ed. 1939	. —
EASEMENTS
GODDARD	The Law of Easements8th ed. 1921	. 30 0
ELECTIONS
ROGERS	Elections.
	Vol. 1. Registration	18th ed. 1929	. 15 0
	Vol. 2. Parliamentary Elections and Petitions	20th ed. 1928	. 30 0
	Vol. 3. Municipal and other Elections and Petitions	21st ed. 1935	. 20 0

EQUITY			s. d
HANBURY	Modern Equity. The Principles of Equity.
	2nd ed. 1937 . 30	0
SETON	Forms of Judgments and Orders. 3 vols.
	7th ed. 1912 . 120	0
ESTOPPEL
EVEREST	The Law of Estoppel 3rd ed. 1923 . 20	0
EVIDENCE—See also CIVIL ACTIONS and CRIMINAL LAW.
HINTON	Evidence and Service Abroad 1930 . 10	0
WILLS	The Law of Evidence 3rd ed. 1938 . 25	0
EXECUTORS—See also ANNUITIES.
WALKER	Executors and Administrators. 6th ed. 1926 . 25	0
WILLIAMS	The Law of Executors and Administrators.
	2 vols.	12th ed. 1930 . 105	0
EXTRADITION
BIRON	The Law and Practice of Extradition 1903 . 25	0
FACTORIES ACT
SAMUELS	The Factories Act, 1937—Annotated 1937 . 30	0
FARM LAW
MOLLER	A Manual of Farm Law 1938 . 20	0
FIDUCIARY RELATIONSHIP
VINTER	Fiduciary Relationship 2nd ed. 1938 . 21	0
FORMS—See also CHANCERY.
CHITTY	King's Bench Forms 16th ed. 1931 . 45	0
FRENCH LAW
AGHION	French Law as applied to British Subjects and Companies 1935 . 10	0
CACHARD	The French Civil Code ...	Revised ed. 1930 . 21	0
FRIENDLY SOCIETIES
FULLER	The Law of Friendly Societies, &c. ... 4th ed. 1926 . 30	0
GERMAN LAW
SCHUSTER	The German Commercial Code 1911 . 7	6
SIEVEKING	The German Law of Private Insurance	... 1927 . 12	6
WANG	The German Civil Code 1907 . 21	0
HINDU LAW—See also INDIA.
CORNISH	Outlines of Hindu Law 1937 . 6	0
DURAI	Questions and Answers in Hindu and Mahomedan Law for Students 1935 . 6	0
HIRE-PURCHASE
EARENGEY	Hire-Purchase	2nd ed. 1938 . 21	0
HOUSING—See also RIBBON DEVELOPMENT
MESTON	The Housing Act, 1936 1936 . 21	0
HUSBAND AND WIFE
LUSH	The Law of Husband and Wife ... 4th ed. 1933 . 42	0
INCOME TAX
KONSTAM	The Law of Income Tax. With Supplement.
	7th ed. 1938 . 42	0

INDIA—See also HINDU LAW.		s. d.
GOURL	The Penal Code of British India	...5th ed. 1936 . 30 0

INSURANCE—See also ROAD USERS.

ARNOULD	The Law of Marine Insurance and Average.
	2 vols.	11th ed. 1924 . 100 0
BELL	Contribution in Fire Insurance 1935 . 15 0

INTERNATIONAL LAW

BURGIN	The Conflict of Laws	3rd ed. 1937 . 20 0
DICEY	The Conflict of Laws5th ed. 1932 . 55 0
HIBBERT	Leading Cases in Conflict of Laws	1931 . 21 0
MÖLLER	International Law in Peace and War.
	Part I. Normal International Relations ... 1931 . 20 0
	Part II. Conflicts between States ... 1935 . 20 0
WHEATON	The Elements of International Law. 2 vols.
		6th ed. 1929 . 63 0

INTERPRETATION

BEAL	Cardinal Rules of Legal Interpretation. 3rd ed. 1924 .	40 0
------	--	------

JUSTICES—See MAGISTERIAL LAWLAND REGISTRATION

BRICKDALE	The Land Registration Act, 1925	...3rd ed. 1927 . 50 0
STEWART-WALLACE	The Principles of Land Registration	... 1937 . 5 0

LANDLORD AND TENANT

SOPHIAN	The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927.	2nd ed. 1928 . 7 6
WOODFALL	The Law of Landlord and Tenant.	24th ed. 1939 . —

LAWYER'S REPERTORY

CAIRNS	The Practising Lawyer's Repertory 1933 . 16 0
--------	-----------------------------------	---------------------

LIBEL AND SLANDER

BALL	The Law of Libel and Slander ...	2nd ed. 1936 . 10 0
GATLEY	Libel and Slander3rd ed. 1938 . 63 0
ODGERS	Libel and Slander6th ed. 1929 . 42 0

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS

BRUNYATE	Limitation of Actions in Equity 1932 . 12 6
----------	---------------------------------	---------------------

LONDON BUILDING ACT

SOPHIAN	The London Building Act, 1930 1930 . 21 0
---------	-------------------------------	-------------------

MAGISTERIAL LAW

GEESON	The Justices' Formulist... 1938 . 15 0
WIGRAM	The Justice's Note Book	... 14th ed. 1938 . 12 6

MAINTENANCE

BODKIN	The Law of Maintenance and Champerty	... 1935 . 10 0
--------	--------------------------------------	-----------------

MASTER AND SERVANT

DIAMOND	The Law of Master and Servant 1932 . 12 6
---------	-------------------------------	---------------------

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT
LATEY	The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937—Annotated.	1937	s. d.
MERCANTILE LAW—See also SHIPPING.
CHARLESWORTH	The Principles of Mercantile Law	...4th ed. 1938	8 6
SMITH	Mercantile Law	13th ed. 1931	42 0
MORTGAGE
COOTE	The Law of Mortgages. 2 vols.	...9th ed. 1927	90 0
HANBURY	The Law of Mortgages 1938	25 0
NOTARY
BROOKE	The Office and Practice of a Notary	...8th ed. 1925	30 0
OATHS
STRINGER	Oaths and Affirmations in Great Britain and Ireland4th ed. 1929	5 0
PARTNERSHIP
FOLLOCK	The Law of Partnership...	... 13th ed. 1937	10 0
PATENTS
BLISS	British Patents and Designs Statutes 1932	4 6
GRIFFITHS	Patent Law and Practice 1928	7 6
HENRIQUES	Patents Conveyancing 1927	7 6
PLEADING
BULLEN	Precedents of Pleadings...	...9th ed. 1935	50 0
ODGERS	The Principles of Pleading and Practice.	12th ed. 1939	—
POWERS
FARWELL	A Concise Treatise on Powers3rd ed. 1916	35 0
PROBATE
MORTIMER	Probate Law and Practice2nd ed. 1927	50 0
PROPERTY—See also CONVEYANCING.
CARSON	Real Property Statutes3rd ed. 1927	30 0
RIVIERE	The "Court Side" of the New Property Acts...	1926	6 0
STRAHAN	A General View of the Law of Property...	7th ed. 1926	16 0
PUBLIC HEALTH
MESTON	The Public Health Act, 1936 1936	30 0
PUBLIC WORKS
KEEN	The Public Works Facilities Act, 1930	... 1931	10 0
RAILWAYS—See also CARRIERS.
WILLIAMS	Modern Railway Law 1928	25 0
REAL PROPERTY—See PROPERTY.
RECEIVERS
RIVIERE	The Law of Receivers and Managers 1912	9 0
RECORD INTERPRETER—See also COURT-HAND RESTORED.
MARTIN	Record Interpreter2nd ed. 1910	20 0

RESTRAINT OF TRADE		s. d.
MÖLLER	Voluntary Covenants in Restraint of Trade ... 1925 .	7 6
REVENUE PROCEDURE
LYNN	Revenue Procedure and Practice in the King's Bench Division 1931 .	12 6
REVERSIONS
RISDON	Sales and Mortgages of Reversions, &c. ... 1938 .	30 0
RIBBON DEVELOPMENT
MESTON	Restriction of Ribbon Development Act, 1935. 1935 .	5 0
ROAD USERS
HUGHES	Road Users' Rights, Liabilities and Insurance. 1938 .	30 0
SALVAGE
KENNEDY	The Law of Civil Salvage 3rd ed. 1936 .	15 0
SHERIFF
MATHER	Sheriff and Execution Law 3rd ed. 1935 .	42 0
SHIPPING—A Special Catalogue is issued.
BRUDOLF	The York-Antwerp Rules 1926 .	15 0
TEMPERLEY	The Merchant Shipping Acts 4th ed. 1932 .	50 0
STATUTES
CHITTY	The Statutes of Practical Utility. 6th ed. — . — Complete to 1937. Price on application.
WILLIAMS	Everyday Statutes Annotated, 1235—1928. 4 vols. with Supplement to 1933 1928 .	168 0
WILLIAMS	Consolidated Supplement, 1929—33 1934 .	25 0
SUCCESSION.
PARRY	The Law of Succession, Testate and Intestate. 1937 .	15 0
SUMMARY CONVICTIONS
FALEY	Summary Convictions 9th ed. 1926 .	42 0
THEATRICAL LAW
ISAACS	The Law relating to Theatres, Music Halls, &c. 1927 .	20 0
TITLE
GOSSET	Modern Investigation of Title 4th ed. 1926 .	10 0
JACKSON	Investigation of Title 4th ed. 1922 .	20 0
TORTS
POLLOCK	The Law of Torts 13th ed. 1929 .	30 0
TRADE UNIONS
SOPHIAN	Trade Union Law and Practice 1927 .	20 0
TRUSTS
GODEFROI	The Law relating to Trusts and Trustees. 5th ed. 1927 .	50 0
TUG AND TOW
BUCKNILL	The Law relating to Tug and Tow. 2nd ed. 1927 .	7 6
VENDORS AND PURCHASERS
DART	Vendors and Purchasers. 2 vols. 8th ed. 1929 .	100 0
WILLS—See also SUCCESSION.
THEOBALD	The Law of Wills 8th ed. 1927 .	50 0

